Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Augusta Alexander Clark was born on March 5, 1932, in Union Town, Alabama, the daughter of Harrison and Lula B. Alexander. Clark grew up in Fairmont, West Virginia, although she spent her entire adult life in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Clark arrived fresh from West Virginia State College working as a "Girl Friday" for 'Color Magazine'. She then earned her Masters of Library Science degree from Drexel University and a law degree from Temple University School of Law.

Clark served as councilwoman at large and majority whip on the City Council of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Clark was the second black woman in the history of Philadelphia to have served on the city council. In over twenty years of service, Clark compiled a distinctive record of accomplishments. As majority whip, she managed legislation and served as an integral part of the Council leadership team. Clark focused her energy on improving the city’s public schools and revitalizing the poor and under developed communities in Philadelphia.

She retired from the city council in February 2000, but was still very much involved in local affairs. In March 2000, Clark became Secretary of Agencies, Authorities, Boards and Commissions in Mayor John Street's cabinet. In this capacity she communicates between the mayor and nearly 150 citywide organizations. She has been the recipient of numerous awards and honors, including being named “Woman of the Year” by Pennsylvania Business and Professional Women.
Augusta Clark is married to Leroy W. Clark. They have one son, Mark, and one daughter, Adrienne.

Hon. Augusta Clark passed away on October 13, 2013.

Video Oral History Interview with The Honorable Augusta Clark, Section A2000_014_001_001, TRT: 0:29:11 2000/07/27

Augusta Clark describes her family's background, telling stories of her parents' experience growing up and meeting in rural Alabama. She explains her parents' decision to migrate north to West Virginia, taking time to praise her mother for having the courage and perseverance to make the move by herself with three small children. Clark credits both her parents with instilling intelligence, confidence, and the drive to succeed in all their children. Clark shares many stories of her childhood that reflect her parents' love and commitment. She then describes her own childhood personality, saying she was ambitious, argumentative, and eager to succeed. Clark describes the race relations in her town of Fairmont, West Virginia, saying that while blacks and whites were segregated in both neighborhoods and schools, there were no instances of violence or conflict.

Augusta Clark describes the conditions of her segregated school in Fairmont, West Virginia, praising the high level of skill and dedication of African American teachers. She talks about expectations of her to attend college, much like the other women in her family. Clark also tells of her aspirations to become a lawyer. Clark describes her first job after graduating from college, an assistantship at Color Magazine, which took her to a big city for the first time, Philadelphia. Clark describes her first experience in an urban environment, saying her confidence led to her hiring at the Free Library of Philadelphia. She says her desire to advance in the field led to her master's degree in Library Science from Drexel University. Clark then details her thirteen-year career as a librarian for the City of Philadelphia and for the General Electric Company. Clark explains her decision to attend law school at Temple University and the special circumstances of her admittance. She then details her first year at law school, in which she faced a great deal of strain academically, professionally, and Augusta Clark describes her challenging experience in law school, saying she juggled commitments to school, her career, and her family. Clark says that she felt self-doubt for the first time when she failed academically, but credits her family with helping her to succeed eventually. Clark then discusses her first involvement with Philadelphia politics, when she assisted U.S. Rep. Bill Gray in his election campaign. She explains what she learned from Gray, and how it gave her the confidence to run for office in the Philadelphia City Council. Clark describes her first campaign, in which she made connections with the electorate despite her house burning down. She describes her feelings on Election Day, going from dejected to elated when she learned of her election. Clark then talks about her first days on the council, detailing her conflicts and differences with Council President George X. Schwartz.

Augusta Clark discusses her time on the Philadelphia City Council in depth, starting with a discussion about the impact made by her and other independent black politicians on Philadelphia government. Clark explains how the emphasis on accountability led to a new public perception of the city council. She recalls some of her major successes, including her improvement of public education. Clark recounts the disagreements she had with Philadelphia mayors, including a discussion about a police brutality incident in 1985. Clark then discusses her current position as a member of the mayor's cabinet, explaining her duties and the impact she is having on local organizations. Clark then moves into a personal discussion, talking about her future plans, living with an oxygen tank, her legacy, and her thoughts on the future of the black community.
