Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Artist Paul Goodnight was born in Chicago on December 31, 1946. At a young age, his mother took him to New London, Connecticut, and later to Boston, where a foster family raised him. After finishing high school, Goodnight was drafted into the Army, and served two years in Vietnam. The experience changed him and upon his return, he was unable to speak because of the horrors he witnessed there. Soon after, Goodnight began to paint, reverting to the means of expression he had employed as a child.

Finding release in his art, Goodnight regained his voice and enrolled in the Vesper George School of Art, taking English classes at a nearby community college to help him along the way. In 1976, he earned his B.A. from the Massachusetts College of Art. Goodnight continued to create, and in 1984 one of his works was displayed on an episode of The Cosby Show. Since then, his works have been featured in such programs as Seinfeld, ER and Living Single. Goodnight then began traveling the world, studying the art of the Caribbean, Africa, Russia and Asia, as well as working under contemporary masters such as Alan Crite and John Biggers.

In 1991, Goodnight founded Color Circle Art Publishing, which is dedicated to the perpetuation of the art and imagery of the African diaspora. His works adorn the homes of such notables as Maya Angelou, Wesley Snipes and Samuel L. Jackson, as well as the halls of the Smithsonian Institute. In 1996, Goodnight was commissioned to create a piece for the 1996 Olympic Games, and in 1998, he designed the World Cup poster. He was awarded the U.S. Sports Academy Artist of the Year Award in 1997. Goodnight's biggest inspiration is his daughter, Aziza.

Paul Goodnight was born in Chicago, Illinois on Paul Goodnight was born in Chicago, Illinois on December 31, 1946, to Marjorie Johnson Brown and Curtis Goodnight. However, he was raised in foster care by Essie and James Lockett with multiple foster brothers and sisters. While Goodnight developed a relationship with his mother and his brother Carl, he was raised with the Locketts between Boston, Massachusetts and Connecticut and moved a lot during his childhood. He reflects on his experience growing up in housing projects and attending various schools, where he enjoyed athletics but struggled behaviorally and academically. Goodnight started drawing in grade school and recalls getting into trouble for some of his drawings.

Paul Goodnight attended several high schools in Boston, Massachusetts and Connecticut, where he struggled behaviorally although he enjoyed athletics. Upon his graduation in the mid-1960s from New London High School in Connecticut, his foster father, James Lockett encouraged him to live on his own. Goodnight, struggling to stay out of trouble, was falsely accused and convicted of sexual assault. He was incarcerated for a year and a half before being exonerated. Goodnight describes this as a difficult period for him, especially since his biological mother passed away during his incarceration. Upon being exonerated, he was drafted into the Vietnam War and describes the effect both being incarcerated and the experience in the war had on his psyche.

Paul Goodnight served in the Vietnam War, and he describes the various violent and traumatic experiences he had in the U.S. Army. He was discharged from the U.S. Army on July 4, 1969. Returning home to Boston, Massachusetts, he struggled after being in Vietnam, and began using heroin. Even after he stopped, he continued to sell drugs at colleges in the Boston area, and he reflects on how difficult that period in his life was. Simultaneously, he was able to attend art school at Vesper George College in Massachusetts followed by Massachusetts School of Art. He describes his alliances with black artists in the 1970s. Upon graduation, he briefly taught in Charlestown in Boston, Massachusetts, before pursuing art full time.

Paul Goodnight describes his development as an artist and the relationships he formed with other black artists, including Lois Mailou Jones, John Biggers, Elizabeth Catlett, and Bing Davis, in the 1980s. He traveled to Haiti where his artistic point of view developed as he painted the atrocities he saw there under the dictatorship of “Baby Doc” Jean-Claude Duvalier. After returning from Haiti, and showing his work in Washington D.C., he next traveled to Nicaragua during their revolution, depicting the Contra’s atrocities. Upon returning to from Nicaragua, Goodnight began to achieve more commercial success in the late 1980s and early 1990s with his prints, and his work became more well known in the black art prints movement.

Paul Goodnight began creating artwork for Hollywood set design in the late 1980s, and by the early 1990s, he found more commercial success with his artwork appearing on numerous black TV shows. He describes the process of growing a business but he experienced a downside to this success on his personal and artistic growth. In the 1990s, Goodnight traveled to Mozambique to depict their civil war with several of his artist colleagues. After this trip, he traveled to Brazil to paint and experienced a spiritual clarity: he describes the process of learning to trust in his happiness. Later, Goodnight returned to art school and began to teach and mentor young artists. He describes his hopes for the black community, reflecting on his own experiences as a young man and artist.

Paul Goodnight reflects on the process of mentorship among artists; he talks about his relationships with artists in his career and how his community has helped him develop as an artist. Goodnight describes what he has learned from his mentor, John Biggers. He articulates the need for positive rites of passages for black men, noting how the experiences of his youth have affected him.

Goodnight talks about traveling to Ghana to paint, as recommended by his mentor, John Biggers. He describes his legacy and how he wants to be remembered. Then, Goodnight narrates his photographs.
