Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Georgian civic leader Kenneth Crooks, Jr. was born in Boston, Massachusetts on September 12, 1931. He attended elementary school in Hampton, Virginia and secondary school in Jamaica, West Indies. Crooks graduated in 1957 from the University of Massachusetts with a Bachelors Degree of Business Administration and received a Masters of Business Administration from Atlanta University in 1962.

Crooks went to work for the National Urban League in its Regional Office in Atlanta, Georgia, covering twelve southern states in 1962. His responsibilities there included providing technical support for local Urban Leagues and developing new affiliates in the South. Crooks remained at the Urban League until 1991, taking time off in 1972 to assist Maynard Jackson's first campaign for Mayor of Atlanta. During his tenure at the Urban League, he worked in Economic Development and Employment, Education, Housing, Counseling and Community Awareness programs. He also developed programs for youth in fine arts, creating the Summer Youth Academy, the "Do the Right Thing" Rallies and brought the Chattahoochee Court-Appointed Special Advocates program for deprived and neglected children to the community.

In 1993, Crooks moved to Columbus, Georgia to serve as President of the Urban League of Greater Columbus. He had previously held the position of Community Service Specialist and Assistant Director of Development at the Fort Valley State College. Crooks also serves as Special Assistant to the pastor at Fourth Street Missionary Baptist Church. He has received several awards recognizing his service to the community, including "Man of the Year" for 2001, given by the Men's Progressive Club of Columbus.

Video Oral History Interview with Kenneth Crooks, Section A2002_016_001_001, TRT: 0:30:10

Kenneth Crooks describes his family’s background. He was born on September 12, 1931 in Boston, Massachusetts. Crooks’ parents, both born in Jamaica, met in the United States in the 1920s. His father, Kenneth B.M. Crooks, was a Harvard University graduate who taught biology at the Hampton Institute in Virginia. His mother, Nella Edgar Crooks, worked as a maid before she had four children. Crooks spent his early childhood in Hampton, Virginia until 1941, when his father moved the family to Jamaica. In Jamaica, the elder Crooks assumed dual posts as headmaster of Happy Grove High School and pastor of Seaside Friends Church. Although Crooks was ostracized as the headmaster’s son, he also had many fond memories of growing up in Jamaica. In 1952, Crooks returned to the States to attend the University of Massachusetts Amherst where he experienced racial segregation. He graduated with a bachelor’s degree in business administration in 1957, and then he was drafted into the U.S. Army as a medic.

Kenneth Crooks struggled to find a job in New England after his discharge from the U.S. Army. Upon his father’s death, Crooks moved to Grambling, Louisiana to take care of his mother. In 1962, Crooks graduated from Atlanta University with an M.B.A. degree. During his time there, Crooks had participated in the Atlanta Student Movement and coordinated student sit-ins. He also excelled academically. After graduation, Crooks assembled the first job placement office at Atlanta University under Rufus Clement. His work was recognized by Clarence Coleman who recruited Crooks to the National Urban League in 1963 as its Assistant Director for Education. At the Urban League, Crooks continued to work as a liaison between black colleges and the business industry. Crooks talks about the significance of the Urban League, his role in the organization, and the influence of Lester Granger, Whitney Young, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. on the organization. He also talks about other black civil rights organizations and his work on Maynard Jackson’s mayoral campaign.
