Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Conrad Walter Worrill was born on August 15, 1941, in Pasadena, California. His mother, Anna Bell, was the first African American to sing in the Pasadena Philharmonic Orchestra and his father, Walter, was a college-educated YMCA manager. Conrad Worrill became an activist and scholar whose goal is to advance the cause and concept of African independence and self-determination both in the United States and internationally.
After moving to Chicago on his ninth birthday, Worrill became serious about athletics. He gained his first racial consciousness through competitive swimming when his black YMCA team faced serious heckling. In 1962, he was drafted into the Army and shipped to Okinawa, Japan. While overseas, he read profusely about African American history, culture and politics. After he returned to Chicago in 1963, Worrill attended George Williams College but became radicalized by the Black Power movement. After graduating in 1968, a West Side YMCA hired him as the program director. He earned his Ph.D. from the University of Wisconsin-Madison. He headed George Williams College's Urban Institute in 1973 and began teaching at Northeastern Illinois University in Chicago in 1976, where he is the coordinator and professor of Inner City Studies Education. While organizing in 1983 to elect Chicago's first black mayor, Harold Washington, Worrill co-founded the Task Force for Black Political Empowerment. As the national chairman of the National Black United Front (NBUF), Worrill is working aggressively to change the American public school curriculum to be inclusive of the contributions of Africans and African Americans.

Worrill is the elected economic development commissioner of the National Coalition of Blacks for Reparations in America (N'COBRA). He served as special consultant of field operations for the historic Million Man March/ Day of Absence on October 16, 1995, in Washington, D.C. As part of the fight to win reparations for the American descendants of slaves, he traveled to Geneva, Switzerland, in 1997 with a delegation to formally charge the U.S. Government with genocide and human right violations before the Commission on Human Rights. The delegation presented the commission with a "Declaration of Genocide by the United States Government Against the Black Population in the United States" with 157,000 signatures.

Upon returning to the United States, Worrill presented this petition to the United Nations in New York City. In 2001, he led a 400-member delegation to the UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa. He writes the syndicated weekly column "Worrill's World," which is widely read in African American newspapers across the country. In August 2002, Worrill organized a national reparations rally attended by thousands.

Conrad Walter Worrill shares a story about his personal dealings with baseball great Jackie Robinson and compares his childhood environment in Pasadena with the bombardment of the senses he experienced in Chicago. Worrill then talks about his living role models and details his athletic exploits while in high school. He then talks about his race awareness coming to the fore with the murder of Emmett Till and the activity in the neighborhood surrounding that event. Lastly, Worrill talks about the Vietnam War and the Civil Rights Movement.
serving as a backdrop to his lack of educational prowess and his rebellion against his father.

Conrad Walter Worrill talks about his gradual interest in the Civil Rights Movement, largely due to the accomplishments of former high school classmate, Diane Nash. He then details his activities in Japan after being drafted into the Army, and his undeniable good fortune in not having to experience armed conflict. Worrill then talks about his return from the war and his desire to get a college education after seeing many of his friends earn degrees. Lastly, he talks about his experiences as manager at the Wabash Avenue YMCA in Chicago, despite his aversion to following in his father's footsteps and his decision to get into social work after the experience gained.

Conrad Walter Worrill discusses his decision to become more politically involved after his encounters with Black Panther leaders, Fred Hampton and Stokely Carmichael. After his job successes at the Wabash Ave. YMCA in Chicago, Worrill talks about his decision to transfer to California. He then details his sudden change of heart following the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and subsequent riots in the black neighborhoods. Worrill then talks about his assignment to the Sears YMCA branch on the West Side and the changes he implemented after the King riots to help the neighborhood heal. Lastly, he details his encounter with Abena Joan Brown and his decision to pursue a master's degree in social work at the University of Chicago.

Conrad Walter Worrill talks briefly about Catalyst, an organization of social workers formed by Abena Joan Brown, and details the work they did to bring corporate dollars and agencies to the black neighborhoods. He then discusses the relationship between Dr. Martin Luther King and Chicago and his activities here. Following the murders of Black Panthers Fred Hampton and Mark Clark, Worrill talks about the black civic leaders he encountered while manager at the Sears YMCA, and details the "Black Curfew" implemented on white people working in the black community. Lastly, he talks about the social programs designed to quell the racial unrest in the city, and his experiences in graduate school at the University of Chicago's School of Social Service Administration.

Conrad Walter Worrill was given an opportunity to direct the 28th Street YMCA in Los Angeles, California, where his father, Walter Fleming Worrill, had previously directed. After the assassination of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., however, Worrill chose to remain in Chicago, Illinois, where he worked at the Sears YMCA and befriended Fred Hampton. In 1969, Worrill was encouraged by Abena Joan P. Brown to attend graduate school. Although he initially resisted the idea, he eventually enrolled at the University of Chicago. While studying there, Worrill participated in his first political campaign, assisting Charles “Mwanza” Ross, Jr. in Gary, Indiana. They faced opposition from white steel unions. As an intern at the Black Strategy Center in 1971, Worrill was offered a fellowship to pursue his Ph.D. at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. He returned to Chicago regularly to attend Communiversity, which inspired his doctoral thesis on teaching institutional power in the secondary social studies curriculum.

Conrad Walter Worrill developed his Black Nationalist identity in the late 1960s while studying regularly at the Communiversity, where he learned about black revolutionary movements influenced by Maoism and Marxism. Worrill earned his Ph.D. at the University of Wisconsin-Madison in 1973, and became an assistant professor at George Williams College, in addition to assuming leadership of their newly formed urban institute. After two and a half years, Worrill was offered a
After two and a half years, Worrill was offered a professorship at the Jacob H. Carruthers Center for Inner City Studies, where he taught history and culture of ethnic groups, introduction to inner city studies, history and philosophy of black education, revolutionary movements and research writing. Additionally, Worrill talks about the creation of the Jacob H. Carruthers Center for Inner City Studies at Northeastern Illinois University. He also describes the history of the Abraham Lincoln Center, and the civil unrest in the Chicago’s Bronzeville neighborhood in the 1910s and 1920s.

Conrad Walter Worrill was involved in the founding of the National Black United Front in 1980. The concept of the organization was first introduced in the late 1970s by Reverend Dr. Herbert D. Daughtry and Jitu Weusi of the Metropolitan Black United Front. By 1985, Worrill became chairman of the organization for the next twenty-five years. Worrill convened with members of the National Black United Front in New Orleans, Louisiana for the organization of the National Black Independent Political Party. While the local group in Chicago, Illinois established the long term goal of electing the first black mayor of the city, they first helped elect Jane Byrne who became the first female mayor of Chicago. Additionally, Worrill talks about black Chicagoans’ majority rule on the school board, and their criticisms of Byrne. He also describes conflicts between Marxists and nationalists in the Pan African movement as well as socialist theories and the existence of white supremacist ideas in revolutionary history.

Conrad Walter Worrill became involved in the campaign to support Harold Washington for mayor of Chicago, Illinois in 1982. Washington was reluctant to officially announce his candidacy run even after meeting his fundraising and voter registration goals, so Worrill gathered local leaders like Reverend Albert Richard Sampson, Lutrelle “Lu” F. Palmer, II, and Danny K. Davis to meet with Washington. Soon after, Washington released an official statement of his mayoral bid, and Worrill began working with African American, Latino and white leaders like Helen Schiller, Walter “Slim” Coleman, Jesus “Chuy” Garcia and Luis Gutierrez to garner further support for Washington’s campaign. Washington was elected the following year in 1983. After Washington’s sudden death in 1987, Worrill planned a commemorative event in his honor, where Aldermen Ed Smith and Timothy C. Evans tried to sway public support away from Eugene Sawyer in the 1987 mayoral election. However, Sawyer ultimately claimed the seat.

Conrad Walter Worrill took part in the Free South African Movement against apartheid in the mid-1980s. In 1987, Worrill traveled to Egypt with the Association for the Study of Classical African Civilization and Jacob H. Carruthers, Jr. to promote the study of African and Egyptian culture and history. A decade later, Worrill participated on campaigns with the National Black United Front to confront the Central Intelligence Agency for spreading crack cocaine in African American communities to fund the Contras in Nicaragua. Worrill’s activist work continued in 2001 with the United Nation’s World Conference against racism, racial discrimination and xenophobia in Durban, South Africa, where he successfully pushed for the transatlantic slave trade to be deemed a crime against humanity. At this point in the interview, Worrill talks about books on African American history, including ‘In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s’ by Clayborne Carson and ‘The Maroon Within Us’ by Asa G. Hilliard.
