Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Wendell Campbell was born on April 27, 1927 in East Chicago, Indiana. Three months after he graduated from high school as a National Honor Society scholar, he was drafted into the U.S. Army. Campbell eventually received his B.A. in Architecture and City Planning at the Illinois Institute of Technology, where he was offered a full-tuition scholarship from Commonwealth Edison, in 1957.

He worked as an architect from 1956 until 1966, when he became president of Campbell & Mascai architectural/urban planning company. In 1966, he became the CEO of Wendell Campbell Associates, Inc., which has since changed its name to Campbell Tiu Campbell to reflect the contributions of partners Domingo Tiu and Campbell's daughter Susan. Noted projects for the firm include: the DuSable Museum of African American History, the McCormick Place Expansion, King Drive Gateway, redevelopment plans for the City of New Orleans and the new Bronzeville Military Academy.

Campbell was a founder and the first president of the National Organization of Minority Architects (NOMA), founded in 1971. He served on the Board of Directors for the Illinois Chapter of NOMA, the Cosmopolitan Chamber of Commerce, the Mercy Hospital and Medical Center, the Black Ensemble Theater, the Chicago Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, the Chicago Architectural Assistance Center, and the South Side YMCA. He was also a member of the City of Chicago Capital Improvement Advisory Council and the City of Chicago Committee on Standards and Tests.

Campbell was dedicated to improving the quality of affordable housing in metropolitan centers through the design of "Smart Homes," housing that brings 21st century technology to the varied needs of today's urban families.

Campbell married June Crusor Campbell in 1954. They lived in Chicago and had two daughters, Susan Campbell Smith and Leslie Campbell.

Campbell passed away on July 16, 2008 at age 81.

Wendell Campbell was born on April 27, 1927 to Selma and Herman Campbell in East Chicago, Indiana. Campbell's great-great-grandmother was President Howard Taft's cook. His grandmother owned a rooming house for steel mill workers in East Chicago. His mother died when Campbell was a young boy. After her death, Campbell and his five siblings were raised by his father and his maternal grandmother, Mary Smith. Campbell's father was a quiet man who worked as a contractor. As a child, Campbell worked closely with his father, who taught him about construction. Campbell's first experience with racial discrimination occurred in grade school when he went to the local movie theater with friends and was asked to move to a different seat. The experience stayed with him, and as a high school student, Campbell became the president of the local chapter of the NAACP. After he graduated in 1945, Campbell sued the theater and launched a successful picketing campaign against all theaters in East Indiana for illegal discrimination in 1947. Campbell also used the NAACP to successfully desegregate the town's swimming pools.

Wendell Campbell was a high school student during World War II. Due to a teacher shortage, Campbell often taught woodshop and mechanical drawing classes at his high school in East Chicago, Indiana. After graduating in 1945, Campbell was drafted into the U.S. Army. In 1957, Campbell graduated from the Illinois Institute of Technology in Chicago, Illinois with a bachelor's degree in architecture and city planning. Campbell struggled to find a job because of racial discrimination. He returned to East Chicago to work on urban renewal at the Purdue Calumet Development Foundation. After ten years, Campbell left the Foundation to form his own firm, Wendell Campbell Associates in 1966. In his firm's nascency, Campbell experienced racially-based friction with a local church that eventually evolved into an enduring relationship. Campbell's design of another church, St. Mark A.M.E. Zion Church won a national award. Campbell also talks about the social impact of World War II on African Americans, his elementary school teachers and his wife, June Campbell, with whom he has two daughters.

Wendell Campbell charts his career trajectory, from working for his father, a contractor, to forming his own architectural firm, Wendell Campbell Associates in 1966 after working at the Purdue Calumet Development Foundation in East Chicago, Indiana for ten years. While a student at the Illinois Institute of Technology in Chicago, Illinois, Campbell studied under Mies van der Rohe and Ludwig Hilberseimer of Germany's famous Bauhaus School. At the Purdue Calumet Development Foundation, Campbell designed a building for senior citizens and learned how to apply for federal grants. Campbell relates the story of how his daughter, Susan Campbell, became a name partner at his firm, which was re-named Campbell Tiu Campbell to reflect the contributions of his daughter and Domingo Tiu. The firm enjoyed a high rate of client referrals. Campbell also talks about fighting racial discrimination at the Indiana Dunes and the use of construction bonds.

Wendell Campbell's projects in Chicago, Illinois include Farragut High School, the Public Building Commission, King Drive Gateway, and McCormick Place. Campbell worked closely with Mayor Harold Washington on the design of the Harold Washington Library. He worked with Mayor Richard G. Hatcher to design community centers, fire stations, schools, and the Genesis Convention Center in Gary, Indiana. Campbell is a founding member of the National Organization of Minority Architects (NOMA). The organization was created in 1972 in response to the dearth of black architects in the American Institute of Architects (AIA). In 1975, Campbell began instituting technological developments at Wendell Campbell Associates to keep his architectural firm competitive. Campbell describes Smart Homes in Chicago, which use federal funds to build affordable, technologically-equipped homes for low-income families in the inner city. Campbell also talks about renowned architects like Marshall Purnell, Paul Devroux, Harold Williams, Paul Williams, and HistoryMaker John Chase.
