Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Junius Gaten was born February 28, 1900, in Smithdale, Mississippi. He was called “Red” because of his thick red hair. At age five, Gaten moved with his aunt to Chicago. He attended Haven Elementary School and Chicago’s oldest black church, Quinn Chapel A.M.E Church. At sixteen, Consumer’s Ice Company in Chicago’s Bridgeport neighborhood hired him. His horses knew the route, which wound through the Black Belt and down integrated Grand Boulevard (now King Drive).

As "Iceman Red," Gaten delivered ice to black activist Ida B. Wells and former black Congressman John Roy Lynch. He resisted and survived the violent Chicago Race Riot of 1919 and the Palmer House Riot of 1924. In the 1920s, Gaten frequented the Dreamland, Royal Garden, Sunset Café and Grand Café. Able to earn extra money by playing the piano for rent parties, Gaten was advised by businessman Jesse Binga to open an account in his Binga Bank. Running errands for Al Capone, he earned $10 dollar tips and Cuban cigars. Gaten knew the Gordon family of the Universal Negro Improvement Association and heard Marcus Garvey speak at Chicago’s Liberty Hall. He talked with Carter G. Woodson, who stayed with Gaten’s uncle during his frequent visits to Chicago. During the Depression, he was assigned to work in Haiti by the Works Progress Administration. “Washington Park Red” aired his political views publicly. He was a union man seeking better wages and equal rights.

Gaten was associated with the Communist Party in the 1940s, joining Margaret Burroughs and Ishmael Flory. In this context, he helped sponsor an appearance by Paul Robeson. Gaten retired more than thirty years ago as operations manager for the Jefferson Ice Company. He bought a house for himself and his late wife, and bought real estate in what is now called the Bronzeville community. In his later years, Gaten served as Sunday School Director at St. John Church - Baptist on Chicago’s southside.

Gaten lived to be 105 years old. He passed away on November 30, 2005.

Junius “Red” Gaten was born on February 28, 1900 in Smithdale, Mississippi. Gaten has ancestral roots from Louisiana and is of Cajun, Creole, Haitian, and Nigerian descent. Gaten’s maternal grandfather was born into slavery. Gaten’s paternal grandfather was also a slave. A skilled blacksmith, he also ran the basket plantation on his master’s plantation with his brother. He was deeded 88 acres of land from his slavemaster and also preached at his slavemaster’s funeral. Gaten’s mother, Myrtice Turner Perkins was sixteen when Gaten was born. Gaten’s father, Charlie, was his mother’s uncle. He made a living collecting insurance on houses he built, sold, and burnt until he was arrested. Family members prevented Gaten’s mother from taking Gaten to New Orleans, Louisiana where she practiced hoodoo. Gaten was raised by his mother’s sisters, Alma Gaten and Mary Perkins. Gaten took his last name from Alma Gaten’s husband. As a young boy, Gaten had a heart condition and his Aunt Mary brought him to Chicago, Illinois for treatment. Gaten was then raised in Chicago.

Junius “Red” Gaten talks about his childhood in the Black Belt of Chicago, Illinois and the development of Grand Belt of Chicago, Illinois and the development of Grand Boulevard on the South Side. As a child, Gaten attended Chicago’s Haven School and Moseley School, but was expelled from Moseley as a teenager. Gaten’s memories of grade school include studying from Noah Webster’s Blue Back Speller and learning the times tables. Across the street from Haven School was the Chicago Coliseum where Gaten saw pianist Ignacy Jan Paderewski in performance. Gaten also heard blues musician Little Brother Montgomery and learned to play piano at a young age without lessons. He describes his experience in Whitely, North Dakota where his aunt and uncle worked on the railroad. As a teenager, Gaten worked as a dishwasher at John R. Thompson’s restaurant in Tip Top Inn before being hired to deliver ice. Gaten also mentions Samuel Insull, the president of Commonwealth Edison and financier of Chicago’s Civic Opera House, Julius Rosenwald who managed Sears and Roebuck, and African American inventor Lewis Howard Latimer.

Junius “Red” Gaten shares his memories from the Chicago Race Riot of 1919. He describes Chicago’s segregated beaches, the stoning of Eugene Williams, and the riots between Bridgeport and the Black Belt neighborhoods in Chicago. Gaten also recounts memories of false media reports, police brutality, and looting stores for goods like ginger ale and cheese. After Gaten began working as an ice delivery man as a teenager, he developed an appreciation for the intelligence of horses. In 1928, a downturn in the ice business led Gaten to a job at Congress Linen Supplies. While working at Congress Linen Supplies, Gaten delivered clothes to Al Capone. He remembers Al Capone giving him generous tips of cash and Cuban cigars. Gaten also talks about issues during Prohibition era Chicago including women’s suffrage, the Italian mafia, and Irish gangs like the Hamburg Social and Athletic Club and Regan’s Colts. During the 1920s, Gaten earned extra money playing piano for house rent parties. Gaten also talks about preeminent boxers like Jack Dempsey, Harry Willis, Jack Johnson, and James Jeffries.

Junius “Red” Gaten describes African American boxer Jack Johnson, promoter Bill Bottoms, and other figures in the boxing world of the 1920s. During the 1920s, Gaten frequented the locales like the Dreamland Café, Sunset Café, Grand Café, and Royal Garden. Gaten describes Marcus Garvey’s activities in Chicago after the founding of the Universal Negro Improvement Association [UNIA] and church bombings incited by racial tensions as African Americans expanded outside of Chicago’s Black Belt. In 1927, Gaten participated in a riot at the Palmer House in downtown Chicago protesting the segregation of elevators in the hotel. The riot was quelled after black Republicans Oscar DePriest, Louis B. Anderson, and Robert R. Jackson met with Mayor William Hale Thomas. As a lifelong citizen of Chicago, Gaten witnessed ethnic tension amongst European immigrants in the city. Gaten recounts the Council Wars led by Edward Vrdolyak and Edward M. Burke following the election of Mayor Harold Washington. Gaten also describes joining the Communist party, the desegregation of Walter Powers’ restaurant and his various contracting jobs.

Junius "Red" Gaten was hired as the engineer’s chief helper at the Lincoln Ice Plant in Chicago, Illinois after helping to build the plant. At the plant, Gaten learned the fundamentals of engineering, cleaned the machinery, and eventually became the plant’s operations manager. Gaten describes the process of making ice with ammonia, a process superseded by electricity. After joining the Communist party around 1927, Gaten helped recruit HistoryMaker William Warfield and Paul Robeson to appear at party meetings in Chicago’s Washington Park. Gaten describes Paul Robeson and other historical civil rights activists from Nat Turner in the 19th Century to lawyer William Robert Ming of the NAACP. Gaten contributed to the Communist party’s efforts to secure freedom of assembly by appealing to U.S. Senator Paul Douglas and his wife, U.S. Representative Emily Taft Douglas. Gaten also talks about Two-Gun Pete and Douglas. Gaten also talks about Two-Gun Pete and Chicago Mayor William Hale Thompson. He also reflects upon factors in buying a house and changes in his neighborhood. Gaten describes the FBI’s assassination of Black Panthers Fred Hampton and Mark Clark in 1969.

Junius “Red” Gaten describes Chicago’s Bronzeville neighborhood during the 1920s. The neighborhood’s vibrant music scene attracted actors like John Barrymore to the Club DeLisa and entertainers like Cab Calloway, Earl Hines, and Louis Armstrong to the Sunset Café. Gaten laments the historical lack of cooperation between black business owners and black banks. He believes that political power in the black community has decreased over time and questions the worth of a degree in a racist society. During the years Gaten worked for Al Capone, he was always flush with cash. Gaten talks about black alderman in Chicago’s political machine like Claude Holman, Kenneth Campbell, and Ralph Metcalf. While working as a union steward, Gaten witnessed the persisting impact of slavery and systemic injustice on African American families and on the poor. Gaten describes his hopes and concerns for the African American community and highlights inspirational women in his neighborhood like activist Ida B. Wells.
