Gwendolyn DuBose Rogers was born on May 30, 1931 in Birmingham, Alabama. Her mother, Lucy Grove DuBose Dickerson Pinkard, was from Mobile, Alabama. She was an industrious woman who earned a degree in beauty culture from Alabama State University and later earned an electrician's certificate. She was also a civil advocate, pressing for proper services in the neighborhood and helping register people to vote in the 1960s. Her father, Robert DuBose, was from the area around Chapman, Alabama where his father owned a large farm. He was a Pullman Porter, and built the family home on property he purchased near Miles College in Fairfield, Alabama. He passed away when Rogers was eleven months old. Rogers' parents met at a piano concert Rogers' mother was playing in and moved to Birmingham where they had three children, Rogers and her two older brothers. After DuBose's death, Rogers' mother remarried twice.

Gwendolyn DuBose Rogers was raised in Birmingham, Alabama, where she attended Fairfield Elementary School, St. Mark's Episcopal School, and Fairfield High School, all of which were black schools. As a student, she was talkative and well-liked for her stories and cakes she baked in her home economics class. She briefly played basketball. Rogers remembers teachers from each level of her education, including college, which she attended at Talladega College in Talladega, Alabama. There, she majored in elementary education at the urging of Lore Rasmussen, a professor there who became a mentor. Rogers earned her B.A. degree in 1952 and went on to the University of Chicago in Illinois, where she earned her M.A. degree in educational psychology in 1953 and studied under Alison Davis. She then taught in public schools in the Chicago area as well as overseas. When she returned from abroad, she began working in early childhood education before earning her Ph.D. degree at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois.

Gwendolyn DuBose Rogers earned her Ph.D. degree for Northwestern University, primarily to ensure that the teaching style she had been employing was aligned with the best practices in the field. Rogers explains that she believes in a free and creative approach to teaching children and talks about the importance of parental involvement in children's development from birth. She was active in Head Start when the program took a holistic approach, including nurses and nutritionists alongside teachers and teacher aides. She was also involved with Family Focus. Rogers explains how Lore Rasmussen's advice to think of perpetrators alongside victims influenced how Rogers went about managing staff who needed to be let go. Rogers went on to work with the Chicago Urban League as director of the education department, where she worked with legislators to ensure educational equity, and later for Chicago Park District's External Affairs, where she helped revitalize parks, including Garfield Park Conservatory.

Gwendolyn DuBose Rogers worked for the Chicago Park District's Department of External Affairs, where she interacted with communities around the city to plan for reinvesting in the local parks. She reflects on the importance of community engagement in making such improvements and talks about ways her department facilitated change. Rogers describes her hopes for the African American community and reflects upon her life, future goals, and family. She also reflects upon her legacy and how she would like to be remembered and concludes by narrating her photographs.
