Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Harriet Elizabeth Jenkins was born on July 26, 1926 in Forth Worth, Texas. She and her sister were raised by an aunt and uncle after the death of both her parents before she was ten years old. At he age of fourteen, in 1941, she graduated from I.M. Terrill High School and received a full scholarship to Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee.
She attended Fisk from 1941 until 1945, where she earned her bachelor's of arts degree in mathematics. In 1945, she left Nashville and joined her sister in California, where she worked in a clerical position at Pacific Overseas Air Service Command until 1948.

There, Jenkins worked as a writer for Golden State Insurance Company and an Identification clerk for the Oakland Police Department from 1948 until 1954. Leaving there, she began her teaching career in the Berkeley, California school system. She quickly rose through the ranks, serving as the city's first Black female vice-principal. In 1957, she earned her master's degree in education from the University of California at Berkeley. She went on to become a school principal, director of elementary education and assistant superintendent of schools. In 1974, Jenkins left Berkeley and moved to Washington, D.C. to be with her husband.

From 1974 until 1992, Jenkins worked as the assistant administrator for equal opportunity programs at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). During her nearly twenty-year tenure at NASA, she was responsible for implementing several programs that assisted minorities and women, including recruiting some of the agency's first African American astronauts. Her efforts extended beyond the astronaut program and included providing more opportunities for minorities in NASA's procurement contracts and research efforts. Under her leadership, university research centers were started and supported in Historically Black Colleges. In 1984, she earned her law degree from Georgetown University.

From 1992 until 1996, she worked with the U.S. Congress and served as the director at the Office of Senate Fair Employment Practices in the U.S. Senate. Her duties included ensuring the requirements of the Civil Rights Act of 1991 were administered for all Senate employees and the Capitol Police. Jenkins also assisted Senate staffs in implementation of the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993.

Jenkins retired from the federal government in 1996. In 2000, NASA established a fellowship program in her name, awarding doctoral fellowships to qualifying minority students. She was the recipient of numerous awards and honors including placing her retirement in the Congressional Record.

Jenkins passed away on December 21, 2016.

Harriett G. Jenkins was born on July 26, 1926 in Fort Worth Texas. Her father, Henry Green, who worked in a brass foundry, died when Jenkins was very young. Her mother, Vivian Moore Green, was a devout Pentecostal Christian and died when Jenkins was nine. Jenkins had four brothers, including an older brother Leonard, who was a dancer in New York City; they died during her childhood. After her parents’ death, Jenkins and her sister Aileene were adopted by her maternal uncle and aunt, Richard and Mattie Moore. Jenkins was close with her maternal grandmother, Fannie Mae Stokes Moore, who owned her own homestead where the family stayed for holidays. She remembers cooking as well as playing the piano at her grandmother’s house and then at church. Jenkins skipped first grade because she had already learned to read, and her teachers at I.M. Terrell High Harriett G. Jenkins graduated from I.M. Terrell High School in Fort Worth, Texas in 1941, at fourteen. She received a scholarship to Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, where she lived in Jubilee Hall, majored in mathematics, and performed in the Fisk University Choir. After graduating in 1945, Jenkins moved to California to join her sister Aileene. She first worked as a clerk for the Pacific Overseas Air Service Command in Oakland. By 1948, Jenkins applied to the Berkeley Unified School District, but she was rejected due to Berkeley, California not employing black women as high school teachers. Instead, she sold policies for the Golden State Insurance Company and then was an identification clerk for the Oakland Police Department. Jenkins enjoyed living in California due to its natural beauty and lack of de jure segregation. In 1954, she was finally hired as a teacher in Berkeley, and subsequently was appointed vice principal of Lincoln Elementary in 1957 and principal of Emerson Elementary in 1959.

Harriett G. Jenkins favored inclusive special education while principal of Emerson Elementary in Berkeley, California. During the mid-1960s, Jenkins became director of elementary education for Berkeley Unified School District. She helped administer the desegregation of the district elementary schools in 1968, which involved two-way busing, and defeat an effort to recall school board members who supported integration. Jenkins moved to Washington, D.C. in 1973. After she was unable to find a job in education, she was hired in 1974 as deputy assistant administrator for equal opportunity programs at NASA, where she operated a program mandated by U.S. Congress to increase the hiring of women, minorities and the disabled. Jenkins worked with Dr. Joseph Atkinson to integrate NASA’s astronaut corps, developing screening that selected HistoryMakers Guion Bluford, Col. Frederick Drew Gregory, and more. She urged NASA to offer opportunities to minority-owned contracting firms and historically black colleges.

Harriett G. Jenkins, while working for the Office of Equal Opportunity Programs at NASA, focused on building programs to help women and minorities succeed in graduate and doctoral programs in math and science. Jenkins was honored when the organization named a grant program for women and minorities pursuing graduate degrees in science the Harriett G. Jenkins Predoctoral Fellowship Program. She left NASA in 1992 in order to lead the new Office of Fair Employment Practices at the United States Senate, where she worked until 1996. After retiring from the federal government, Jenkins joined the Montgomery County Commission on Human Rights in 1997. Her support for affirmative action programs and diversity gave her insight into the underlying issues and impact of the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Gratz v. Bollinger. Jenkins reflects upon her life and legacy. She describes her hopes and concerns for the African American community, how she would like to be remembered, and why she believes history is important.
