Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Alvin Dwight Pettit was born on September 29, 1945, in Rutherfordton, North Carolina. His mother worked as a beautician and his father worked as an engineer. His family migrated to Baltimore after his father was offered an engineering job in Maryland. In 1958, his father initiated a lawsuit against Harford County, Maryland school officials, forcing the school system to integrate the all white Aberdeen High School. Pettit, represented by Thurgood Marshall, won his suit and was admitted to Aberdeen and graduated in 1963. In addition to being the first African American male to attend the school, he also integrated the football team.

Pettit attended Howard University from 1963 until 1967, where he earned his bachelor's of arts degree. While at Howard, Pettit played football, participated in the ROTC program, reaching the rank of colonel and pledged Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity. While at Howard, he received the Holland Ware award for the student athlete demonstrating all around athletic and academic ability. Pettit earned his law degree from Howard in 1970.

In 1970, Pettit began his career as a trial attorney for the Small Business Administration under President Richard Nixon. His duties included preparing briefs for the Department of Justice on fraud cases involving SBA loans. He litigated his first private case, Pettit vs. the United States. The case received national acclaim and is considered a landmark decision, setting the standard for back pay awards in discrimination cases. In 1973, Pettit brought the first suit in the country against Maryland for discrimination in the bar examination. The case would lead to other states changing its testing practices. In 1973, Pettit left the SBA and formed Mitchell, Pettit, David and Gill and later his own practice.

Pettit handled many high profile criminal and personal injury cases. In 1977, he won Scott v. Sutton Place, which determined that Maryland landlords have responsibility and are liable for criminal activity on their property. In 1983, he won his first million-dollar judgment against the Washington, D.C. Transit Authority in the accident case, Goodwin v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transportation. Pettit continues to practice law in Baltimore, where he resides with his wife, Barbara.

A. Dwight Pettit was born on September 29, 1945 in Rutherfordton, North Carolina. His mother, Mildred Miller Pettit, was also born in Rutherfordton and grew up close to several of her siblings. She worked as a beautician. His father, George Pettit, was born in Sylva, North Carolina. Pettit's paternal grandfather, Abraham Pettit, was a highly respected minister in western North Carolina. His father, known for being a strong fighter and independent, studied engineering at Negro Agricultural and Technical College of North Carolina in Greensboro while co-owning and operating the South Side Tavern with his brother. He then moved the family to the Baltimore, Maryland area when hired by the federal government to work as an engineer at Fort Holabird. Pettit recalls family holidays and playing sports with his paternal uncles. He talks about his experiences growing up in Turner Station in Dundalk, Maryland, his paternal aunt Dorothy Mae, and memories of Chesapeake Bay.

A. Dwight Pettit's father and nine paternal uncles took turns attending Negro Agricultural and Technical College of North Carolina in Greensboro while working to pay for each other's education. They also fought in World War II and achieved distinguished careers. Pettit was an only child, which often led to feeling lonely, especially when dealing with his father's alcoholism. Pettit attended Fleming Elementary School in Turner Station, then Bragg Elementary School and Sollers Point High School in Sparrows Point, Maryland. In 1958, Pettit's father was reassigned to the largely white, rural community of Aberdeen, Maryland. Pettit was initially sent to the segregated Havre de Grace Consolidated School, but his father soon arranged for him to board with a family in Baltimore and attend the more academically rigorous William H. Lemmel Junior High School. Pettit's family partnered with the local NAACP and Juanita Jackson Mitchell to integrate Aberdeen High School, which sparked Pettit's interest in the law.

A. Dwight Pettit was at the center of a successful 1960 lawsuit to integrate Aberdeen High School in Aberdeen, Maryland. Pettit's family was represented by Thurgood Marshall and Juanita Jackson Mitchell. The principal of the segregated school Pettit was attending testified against him, and the case was one of the last to be decided under Plessy v. Ferguson, 1896 rather than Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 1954. After winning the right to enter Aberdeen High School, Pettit became a star player on its football team and performed well academically, although he encountered racism during his time at the school. He decided to attend Howard University in Washington, D.C. in order to leave Baltimore and benefit from the environment of a prominent historically black university. At Howard, Pettit continued playing football and performing well academically, despite some challenging courses and professors. After completing his undergraduate degree in 1967, Pettit entered Howard University School of Law.

A. Dwight Pettit graduated from Howard University School of Law in 1970 and began working as a trial attorney for the U.S. Small Business Administration in Washington, D.C. While still working as a trial attorney, Pettit filed an anti-discrimination suit against the Maryland State Bar Association and represented his father in the landmark civil rights case, Pettit v. U.S., 1973. To represent his father, Pettit filed an exemption to litigate against the federal government and managed to maintain his deferment from the U.S. military. Pettit won and established case law on the issue. Pettit opened his own practice in Baltimore, Maryland where he argued several prominent civil rights cases. Pettit developed a friendship with and campaigned for President James “Jimmy” Carter in 1976. Carter wanted to appoint him U.S. attorney for Maryland, but Pettit lost the nomination and began practicing corporate law. Pettit also served on the compliance review commission for the National Democratic Party in 1980.
