Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

George Edward Curry was born on February 23, 1947, in Tuscaloosa, Alabama; his mother worked as a domestic and his father was a mechanic. Curry's father abandoned the family when Curry was just seven years old, leaving him to step into the role of the man of the house, assisting his mother in raising his three younger sisters. In 1965, Curry earned his high school diploma from Druid High School, where he was a member of the football team and sports editor of the school newspaper.

In 1966, Curry moved to New York where he worked for The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) for a year. He went on to study at Knoxville College in Tennessee. Fulfilling a lifelong dream, Curry began his professional journalism career as a reporter for Sports Illustrated magazine in 1970; he was the second African American hired by the publication.

After leaving Sports Illustrated in 1972, Curry headed west and worked as a beat reporter for The St. Louis Post-Dispatch until 1983. In 1977, he founded the St. Louis Minority Journalism Workshop, a training program for aspiring high school journalists; that same year, he wrote his first book Jake Gaither: America's Most Famous Black Coach. From 1983 until 1989, Curry worked for the Chicago Tribune as a Washington Correspondent, covering political stories such as Jesse Jackson's 1984 presidential campaign. From 1989 until 1993, Curry worked as the New York bureau chief of the Tribune. From there, Curry served as editor-in-chief of Emerge magazine until it folded and printed its final edition in 2000; under his leadership the magazine won more than forty national journalism awards.

In 2001, Curry became editor-in-chief for the National Newspaper Publishers Association News Service, or NNPA, and BlackPressUSA.com; his weekly syndicated column appeared in more than two hundred African American newspapers. While at NNPA, Curry's work has included covering the Supreme Court's decision on the University of Michigan's affirmative action case and America's war with Iraq.

In 2003, Curry was named Journalist of the Year by the National Association of Black Journalists; he is also on NABJ's list of Most Influential Black Journalists of the 20th Century.

George Curry was interviewed by The HistoryMakers on September 27, 2004.

Curry passed away on August 22, 2016.

George Curry was born on February 23, 1947 in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. His mother, Martha Lee Brownlee, was born in Greensboro, Alabama around 1929 and worked as a domestic. Her mother, Sylvia Harris, was part Indian and was born on August 23, 1900. Curry's father, Homer Lee Curry, was born to Joe Curry and Liza Curry in Reform, Alabama and was mechanic who had been in the U.S. Air Force. He was also an alcoholic and left the family when Curry was around eight years old. Curry has three younger sisters: Charlotte Ann Purvis, Sylvia Christine Polk, and Susan Carol Gandy. He was raised in an area of Tuscaloosa known as “The Bottom” until his family moved into the McKenzie Court housing projects when he was in about seventh grade. Curry was inspired by the head of the housing projects, Robert Glynn, to join the Benjamin Barnes Branch of the YMCA and to attend college. He was also encouraged by his high school principal, Macdonald Hughes, who brought successful alumni back to school for a motivational career day.

George Curry recalls his childhood playing basketball with his cousins in Reform, Alabama on the land that his grandfather, Joe Curry, owned. He attended Central Elementary School and 32nd Avenue Elementary School in Tuscaloosa, Alabama and recalls his first grade teacher, Johnnie Anderson Giglio. Curry’s stepfather was William Henry Polk, who drove a dump truck at the University of Alabama and would bring books home from campus. Curry recalls his stepfather reading the Pittsburgh Courier and leading family discussions about the news. Curry was a mischievous child and saw education as a way to get out of the South. He recalls the racism in Alabama, including segregated busses and drinking fountains, as well as protesting the bombing of the 16th Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama. Curry attended Druid High School in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and decided in eighth grade that he wanted to be a journalist. He was the sports editor for his high school newspaper, the Dragon’s Tale.

George Curry wrote for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch from 1972 until 1983. In 1977, he founded the St. Louis Minority Journalism Workshop with the Greater St. Louis Association of Black Journalists, including Gerald Boyd and Sheila Rule. In 1983, Curry began writing for the Chicago Tribune, where he covered the 1984 presidential campaign of HistoryMaker Reverend Jesse Jackson, Sr. From 1984 to 1989, Curry worked as a Washington, D.C. correspondent, and from 1989 until 1993, he worked as a New York bureau chief. In 1993, Curry became editor-in-chief of Emerge, a black news magazine launched by Wilmer Ames and owned by Robert L. Johnson, the founder of BET. He recalls stories published in Emerge including HistoryMaker Reginald Stuart's feature on Kemba Smith and Lori S. Robinson's story on "Rape of a Spelman Coed." Curry received notoriety for covers depicting U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. In 2000, Emerge was shut down and given to HistoryMaker Keith Clinkscales, who replaced it with Savoy magazine.
