Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

The Honorable Leah Ward Sears became the first woman and the youngest person ever to become a Georgia State Supreme Court Justice. Sears was born on June 13, 1955 in Heidelberg, Germany. She grew up traveling the globe with her family and father, Colonel Thomas Sears, who served as Master Army Aviator in the U.S. Army. The family eventually settled in Savannah, Georgia, where she attended elementary and high schools. In 1976, Sears earned her B.S. degree at Cornell University and moved to Atlanta, where she attended Emory University to earn her J.D. degree.

After earning her law degree, Sears decided to stay in Atlanta. There, she made a name for herself working as a trial lawyer for the law firm, Alston and Bird. In 1985, after five years of working, Mayor Andrew Young appointed her as a judge in Atlanta’s City Traffic Court. After serving three years in this position, Sears was appointed as a Superior Court judge for the state of Georgia. She became the first African American woman to hold such a position in the state of Georgia. In February of 1992, Governor Zell Miller appointed Sears to Georgia’s Supreme Court, where she became the first woman and the youngest person ever to serve. Sears retained her seat on the state’s Supreme Court by winning a statewide election in the fall of 1992. This made her the first woman to win a contested statewide election in Georgia. In 1993, Sears received an honorary Doctor of Law degree from Morehouse College. She then continued her education and earned a LL.M degree from the University of Virginia School of Law. Sears is currently the number two justice in Georgia’s Supreme Court. She is considered next in line to become the state’s chief justice.
Sears has several civic and professional affiliations. She served as chairman of both the American Bar Association’s Board of Elections and the Judicial Section of the Atlanta Bar’s Minority Clerkship Program. Sears founded and served as the first president of the Georgia Association of Black Women Attorneys. Currently, she serves as an adjunct professor of pretrial litigation at the Emory Law School Council and is a member of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc. In 1998, Sears was named the “Georgia Woman of the Year” by the Georgia State Commission on Women. In 2001, she was the recipient of the Emory Medal from Emory University for being an “Outstanding Young Alumna”.

Sears is married to Haskell Sears Ward, and they have two children, a son, Addison, and a daughter, Brennan.

Leah Ward Sears slates her interview and explains the manner with which she assumed three different full names in her life. She lists her favorites. Sears’ mother Onnye Jean Roundtree Sears was born on January, 17 1930 in Sand Springs Oklahoma. Sears’ grandmother was Elva Roundtree who was alive during the Tulsa race riots. Elva’s grandfather was a Buffalo Soldier. The identity of Onnye’s father was believed to be a white Tulsa school superintendent named Boyd. Onnye was very light skinned with long straight hair and was very intelligent, which separated her socially and educationally from others. She taught school but her income was always secondary. Thomas Euric Sears was born April 6, 1927 in Norfolk, Virginia. His mother and father were Eunice Mears and Thomas Sears. They had fifteen children, most of whom did well or attended college. The family was upbeat about race relations and maintained great faith in God. Thomas’ parents were very strict and food was rationing was common but he fondly remembered his youth.

Sears’ older brother was born in Heidelberg, Germany and her younger brother was born in Monterey, California. Her father was among only a few black officers in Germany; her parents had high expectations for her. Since her father was so dark and her mother so light, for a time Sears believed her mother was white. Sears was maltreated by white majority classmates in the United States. School busing, which took her from a majority white school to a black one, incentivized her early graduation. She enrolled into Cornell. She was active in high school and developed an academic side and a vain side. She adored Cornell for its buffet style approach of liberal arts education and political activism. Her parents, but especially her father, had more conservative dreams for her.

When she moved to the appellate court she prepared with courses at the University of Virginia, where she studied for three years and earned an LL.M. As a judge she learned that her primary responsibility was to be a quiet, considerate, and compassionate counselor of the legal process for all types of persons. At 32 she successfully ran in a contested election for the Fulton County Superior Court. This accelerated trajectory from traffic court up to felony cases without the intervening courts initially upset some of her peers. Sears had ambivalent attitudes with regard to the death penalty but as a judge she divorced her personal judgment from the law. The phenomenon of high black incarceration represents the product of numerous factors beginning from childhood, reinforced by society, and the mandatory sentencing at the Superior Court level; prosecutorial discretion exists but is not applied consistently between the wealthy and the poor. At 36 Governor Zell Miller appointed her to the Supreme Court in 1992.

Sears passionately believes in civil access to the courts for all persons. Her court's reversal of Bowers v. Hardwick was an effort she personally spear-headed. Another prominent case was the removal of child molestation charges for Marcus Dixon among others. Sears wishes the black community to resolve its many lingering problems rather than ignoring them. One such problem is the effect of absentee fathers. She believes society give disproportionate accolades. Materiality, sex, and beauty are like wine while civil servants work the vineyards. Sears married Haskell Sears Ward in 1999. His wisdom provided a measured and calming perspective that helped her job performance. A famous Atlanta murder demonstrated to her that even people she knew could harbor great darkness. Sears wished she matured earlier to avoid a doomed first marriage; a blended family is tarnish. It is her quiet pursuit of excellence and trailblazing that will help her be remembered.
