Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Educational psychologist Percy Bates was born July 8, 1932 in Pensacola, Florida. Raised by his mother, Gladys Travis Bates, he attended Spencer Bibbs Elementary School and Booker T. Washington High School. After moving to Detroit, Bates ran track and played football at Hamtramack High School, and he graduated from there in 1950. Entering the United States Army in 1952, Bates served at Fort Bliss in El Paso, Texas, where he sang with fellow soldier and pianist Earl Grant. After earning his B.S. degree in biology from Central Michigan University in 1958, Bates received his M.A. in vocational rehabilitation in 1961 from Wayne State University and his Ph.D. in educational psychology from the University of Michigan in 1968.

In 1968, during a strike of black students demanding black faculty at the University of Michigan, Bates was promoted to assistant professor of education. At the University of Michigan's School of Education, Bates served as assistant division director of curriculum, teaching and psychological studies and as director of programs for educational opportunity. He later became deputy assistant secretary of special education in the United States Department of Education.

Bates is a member of the Board in Control of Intercollegiate Athletics at the University of Michigan. He is also very active in University of Michigan's Student Athlete Advisory Committee. A founding board member and former chairman of the Higher Education Commission of the National Alliance of Black School Educators, Bates has received numerous awards. Bates lives in Ann Arbor with his wife Cheryl.

Percy Bates was born on July 8, 1932 in Pensacola, Florida. His mother, Gladys Travis Bates, was born around 1911 in Pensacola. Her family likely came from Troy, Alabama. She graduated from Booker T. Washington High School, the first in her family to complete secondary education. She was a domestic worker and had three children. His father, Percy Bates, Jr., was born in 1913 in Pensacola. He did not graduate from high school and worked general labor jobs. Although Bates' parents divorced when he was five, his mother made sure that he maintained a relationship with his father. Bates' step-grandfather engraved headstones for a living. Bates enjoyed spending time at his paternal grandmother's house visiting his cousins. He was a good student and frequently competed with a young female classmate in spelling bees at Spencer Bibbs Elementary School. As a child, Bates crabbed and fished in the Gulf of Mexico, but he did not enjoy it very much. At one point in his youth, he saw a rare snowfall in Pensacola.

Percy Bates attended Spencer Bibbs Elementary School, a large all-black school that was an important part of his community in Pensacola, Florida. Bates found elementary school easy and was a responsible and well-behaved child; his mother often trusted him with paying bills. As a child, Bates attended Sunday school with his family, but church was a social rather than religious experience and not an integral part of his childhood. He attended Booker T. Washington High School through eighth grade. Due to his mother's fear that he would end up in trouble in Florida, he moved to Hamtramck, Michigan near Detroit with family friends to be a babysitter for their children. He felt more like an employee with the family, but he was driven to remain and take advantages of opportunities offered up North. Bates attended Copernicus Junior High School for one year then moved to Hamtramck High School. He struggled in these schools, which he found much less supportive, and aimed for just getting by rather than excelling.

Percy Bates attended Hamtramck High School in Hamtramck, Michigan. He sang, played football and ran track there. His favorite subject was English, which he passed after being motivated by a challenging teacher. Bates decided to attend Central Michigan College in Mount Pleasant but deferred enrollment when drafted into the U.S. Army. He was stationed at Fort Bliss near El Paso, Texas from 1952 to 1954. In El Paso, Bates sang with musician Earl Grant and was almost tempted to give up college for a singing career. At Central Michigan, Bates joined a study group of fellow psychology majors who pushed each other to excel academically. His mother provided financial support when he struggled to cover tuition, and Bernard N. Meltzer mentored and influenced Bates and other African American students. After graduating from Central Michigan in 1958, Bates entered Wayne State University in Detroit and earned a master's degree in vocational rehabilitation before pursuing a Ph.D. at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor.

Percy Bates completed his Ph.D. in educational psychology at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor. He wrote his dissertation on student motivation, using his research findings about internal and external motivation. As a graduate student, Bates advised undergraduates and worked with students in the Black Action Movement. He completed his degree in 1968. Although the university normally did not hire internally, they thought he would be well-suited to join the faculty. Bates was promoted to assistant professor of education during the time when University of Michigan president Robben Wright Fleming negotiated with student protesters who were shutting down the campus. He later became program head, then assistant dean. He took a leave of absence to serve as deputy assistant secretary in the U.S. Office of Education under President Jimmy Carter. Since then, he has continued teaching at the University of Michigan and serving as its faculty representative to the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

Percy Bates admired the negotiations that occurred between the Black Action Movement and the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor during the late 1960s. Both the administration and the student protesters made a concerted effort to keep negotiations peaceful and productive, which kept the university from experiencing the riots that occurred on other campuses. From 1979 to 1980, Bates worked as deputy assistant secretary of special education in the U.S. Office of Education in Washington, D.C. In the 1980s, Bates began serving as faculty representative to the National Collegiate Athletic Association and Big Ten Conference for the University of Michigan. Bates talks about the pressures student athletes face, both financially and academically. He also describes his concerns for the African American community, explaining why he disagrees with Bill Cosby, and the impact of the Gratz v. Bollinger, 2003 U.S. Supreme Court case on affirmative action. He reflects upon his life and legacy, and talks about his family.
