Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Actor Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. was born May 27, 1936 in Sheepshead Bay, Coney Island to Hellen Rebecca Wray Gosset and Louis Gossett Sr.. Gossett’s Brooklyn neighborhood nurtured activists and artists like Gustav Blum, Harvey Keitel, Neil Simon, Neil Diamond and Arthur Miller. Gossett attended PS 135 and was student body president of Mark Twain Junior High School (PS 209). When Gossett acted in a production of You Can’t Take It With You at Abraham Lincoln High School, talent scouts picked him for Broadway’s Take A Giant Step, for which Gossett won the Donaldson Award in 1952 for best newcomer to theatre. In 1954, he appeared in Desk Set with Shirley Booth. After graduation Gossett received a basketball scholarship to New York University. The 6’4” Gossett, who also pitched against Sandy Koufax, was drafted by the New York Knickerbockers in 1958.

Deciding to forego sports for acting, Gossett studied at The Actors Studio with John Sticks and Peggy Fury. In 1961, Gossett’s acting skills were soon noticed when he was cast in the Broadway production and movie Raisin in the Sun. He was also in the all-star cast of 1961’s The Blacks that featured James Earl Jones, Cicely Tyson, Roscoe Lee Brown and Maya Angelou. Gossett later went on to appear in small television roles including: The Bush Baby and Companions in Nightmare. Gossett briefly tried his hand at folk singing before he got his first big movie role in The Landlord with Diana Sands. Gossett has appeared in over 50 movies and hundreds of television shows between 1971 and 1999. Some of the more popular shows he appeared in (listed in chronological order) are: Skin Game, The Deep, Don’t Look Back: The Story of Leroy “Satchel” Paige, Sadat, Finders Keepers, Enemy Mine, Firewalker, Iron Eagle, A Gathering of Old Men, The Principal, The Father Clements Story, Diggstown, Return to Lonesome Dove, Curse of the Starving Class, A Good Man in Africa, Ray Alexander, Captive Heart: The James Mink Story, Y2K, and Lackawanna Blues. Gossett was awarded an Emmy for his portrayal of “Fiddler” in Alex Haley’s miniseries Roots (1977). He won a Golden Globe Award for HBO’s The Josephine Baker Story (1991) and an Academy Award for best supporting actor for his portrayal of Sergeant Emil Foley in An Officer and a Gentleman (1982).
Gossett’s community involvement began in 1964, when he received a grant with James Earl Jones and Paul Sorvino to begin a theatre group for trouble bound youth. Gossett, who often plays strong role models, frequently speaks to youth groups about manhood, drugs and life. Gossett also partnered with Father George Clements to develop Shamba Centers to teach African American history and culture. Eracism is a non-profit that Gossett developed in an effort to combat racism in America and abroad. In 2005, he sponsored a Los Angeles anti-violence effort called One Summer of Peace.

Louis Gossett, Jr. was interviewed by The HistoryMakers on March 30, 2005.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. was born on May 27, 1936 in Brooklyn, New York. His mother, Helen Rebecca Wray, was born in Watkinsville, Georgia in the 1920s. Wray was a mixed-race woman of Native American descent, and grew up around Athens-Clarke County, Georgia. Gossett describes his maternal family history. His father, Louis Gamal Gossett was born in Bennettsville, South Carolina in the 1910s. The Gossett family migrated to New York City, New York in the 1920s, and Gossett, Jr. was in the first generation born and raised in the North. He describes growing up in Brooklyn, New York, and spending summers in Georgia on his great-grandmother’s watermelon farm. He contrasts living in a multiracial northern city to living in the racially homogenous South. Gossett remembers his great-grandparents, farming as a boy, and experiencing racism in the South. He shares his belief in the importance of preserving ancestry and archiving, and his plans to facilitate learning and exploration of black history and culture.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. describes his father’s family background and the events leading to his Broadway debut. Gossett’s father, Louis Gamal Gossett, was born in Bennettsville, South Carolina, in the Gullah region of North America. Gossett explains the history of Bennettsville, and describes the culture of its native people, the Geechee. Gossett talks about his relationship with his father and his earliest childhood memories in the South. Gossett attended Mark Twain Junior High and Abraham Lincoln High School, and describes the advantages of growing up in an urban multicultural and multiracial neighborhood. In 1953, Gossett was cast in a lead role in the play titled ‘Take A Giant Step’ by African American playwright Louis S. Peterson. The work debuted at the Forrest Theatre in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1953. Gossett trained with several notable theater personalities and delivered an outstanding performance. Following his debut, he was cast in several early television roles in the 1950s.

Louis Gossett, Jr. describes his experience as a child actor as well as his decision to commit to acting. Gossett earned a Donaldson Award for best newcomer in 1953 for his performance in ‘Take A Giant Step.’ Gossett talks about the cultural and political climate of the 1950s, including the impact of communist repression and the influence of gospel music. ‘Take a Giant Step’ ran successfully for two years; however, Gossett still hoped to be a professional athlete. He enrolled in New York University, and describes having to balance his social life, acting, and collegiate sports. Gossett walked away from sports entirely in 1959, after suffering an injury at a tryout with the New York Knicks. Afterwards, he was cast in the Broadway debut of Lorraine Hansberry’s ‘A Raisin in the Sun.’ He reflects on his family’s reaction to the performance. Gossett also describes working alongside HistoryMakers Ossie Davis and Ruby Dee, and explains their influence on his decision to commit to a career in the theater.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. was cast in the 1954 stage play ‘The Desk Set’ in Wilmington, Delaware. He was refused service at a New England restaurant until the play’s lead, Shirley Booth, threatened to quit if Gossett was not served. In 1961, Gossett starred in Jean Genet’s off-Broadway play ‘The Blacks,’ which featured James Earl Jones, Cicely Tyson and HistoryMaker Maya Angelou among other notables. He talks about his other early performance credits including the television movie ‘Companions in Nightmare.’ In 1966, Gossett flew to Universal Studios in Los Angeles, California for filming, and was among the first group of African Americans to stay in the Beverly Hills Hotel. He describes being racially profiled onsite and handcuffed to a tree by local police. In 1969, Gossett starred in his first motion picture ‘Bushbaby,’ which began filming in Kenya in 1964. Gossett describes the lasting impression of his first trip to Africa.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. reflects on major milestones in his career in the 1970s and 1980s. In 1970, Gossett made his first major film appearance in ‘The Landlord’ followed by ‘Skin Game’ in 1971. In 1971, he also won a Drama Critics’ Circle Award for his portrayal of Patrice Lumumba in the play ‘Murderous Angels.’ Gossett highlights his favorite performances, and talks about the influence of television and the importance of multicultural representation in the media. Gossett speaks about starring in the groundbreaking miniseries ‘Roots’ in 1977 as well as pivotal moments in his performance in the show, including improvising the closing lines of the iconic whipping scene. Gossett describes the value in, and demand for, African American historical narratives. Gossett won the Academy Award for Best Supporting Actor in 1982 for his role in ‘An Officer and a Gentleman,’ becoming only the second black male to receive an Oscar after Sidney Poitier. He describes preparing for the role and winning that night.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. speaks about his life and movie roles in the 1980s. Gossett did not receive substantial film work after his Oscar win in 1982. He was offered a moderate number of television roles, and describes feeling unappreciated. In 1983, Gossett portrayed former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in the two-part television miniseries, ‘Sadat.’ The casting decision was criticized because Gossett was African American and not Arab. He describes other television and film work in the 1980s including ‘Enemy Mine’ in 1985, ‘Iron Eagle’ in 1986, and ‘The Father Clements Story’ in 1987. In 1988, Gossett was featured in a ‘Roots’ reprisal called ‘Roots: The Next Generations.’ He speaks about his choice to portray mentor-figures, and the real-world need for mentorship. Gossett argues that storytelling is the obligation of the community, and not the responsibility of Hollywood. He lists the films he has produced, and what stories and biopics he would like to see in the future.

Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. talks about his interest in historical films, and at the time, his current and upcoming projects. In 1996, Gossett starred in the television movie ‘Captive Heart’ about the black Canadian businessman James Mink. Mink’s mixed race daughter was kidnapped and sold into slavery in the American South. The movie depicts the expedition to rescue her. In 2005, Gossett was featured in the television movie adaptation of Ruben Santiago-Hudson’s play ‘Lackawanna Blues.’ Gossett talks about the state of black representation in Hollywood, and imagines hypothetical projects for his future including a biopic about the life and career of black comedian Stepin Fetchit. Gossett describes his favorite and most difficult roles, and the lengthy makeup application process he underwent in ‘Enemy Mine.’ He talks about his hopes and concerns for the African American community and of his two sons. Gossett considers what he would have done differently, his legacy, and how he would like to be remembered.
