Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Actor Louis Cameron Gossett, Jr. was born May 27, 1936 in Sheepshead Bay, Coney Island to Hellen Rebecca Wray Gosset and Louis Gossett Sr.. Gossett’s Brooklyn neighborhood nurtured activists and artists like Gustav Blum, Harvey Keitel, Neil Simon, Neil Diamond and Arthur Miller. Gossett attended PS 135 and was student body president of Mark Twain Junior High School (PS 209). When Gossett acted in a production of "You Can’t Take It With You" at Abraham Lincoln High School, talent scouts picked him for Broadway’s "Take A Giant Step," for which Gossett won the Donaldson Award in 1952 for best newcomer to theatre. In 1954, he appeared in "Desk Set" with Shirley Booth. After graduation Gossett received a basketball scholarship to New York University. The 6’4” Gossett, who also pitched against Sandy Koufax, was drafted by the New York Knickerbockers in 1958.

Gossett’s community involvement began in 1964, when he received a grant with James Earl Jones and Paul Sorvino to begin a theatre group for trouble bound youth. Gossett, who often plays strong role models, frequently speaks to youth groups about manhood, drugs and life. Gossett also partnered with Father George Clements to develop Shamba Centers to teach African American history and culture. Eracism is a non-profit that Gossett developed in an effort to combat racism in America and abroad. In 2005, he sponsored a Los Angeles anti-violence effort called One Summer of Peace.

Louis Gossett, Jr. was interviewed by "The HistoryMakers" on March 30, 2005.

Video Oral History Interview with Louis Cameron Gossett, Section A2005_086_001_001, TRT: 0:29:47 2005/03/30

Louis Gossett Jr. begins the interview by discussing his mother Hellen Rebecca Wray’s side of the family. While recalling his mother’s lineage, Gossett describes the lack of African American history in mainstream films, schools, and libraries. Due to this lack of African American history in society, Gossett develops Shamba Centers as centers used to inform African American youth about their history. Gossett discusses being a young boy in the 1950s and enduring segregation in the train system. He recalls riding in the cattle car when traveling through the southern states of Georgia, Maryland, and Washington D.C.; but then switching to first class once he was further north. Gossett remembers his childhood neighborhood in Coney Island as being a mix of Mafia, Jewish and African American families. Gossett remembers his neighborhood as being racially tolerant and nurturing some of the most influential minds like those of Neil Simon and Arthur Miller.

Louis Gossett Jr. describes the people of Bennettsville, South Carolina as being known as the Geechie people. Gossett believes that the Geechies were likely descendants of the Igbo in Africa; they were proud and serious in their demeanor. He recalls how he only felt confident as a child when he was playing baseball or basketball. Gossett credits Gustave Blumberg, his teacher, as encouraging him to audition for “Take a Giant Step”. Gossett then describes his family history; telling a story about how his father Louis Gamal Gossett helped the Mafia run gambling rings in Brooklyn, New York. Gossett admirably remembers growing up in Brooklyn; the success rate for local students was 65% and being taught by John Sticks and Peggy Fury.

Louis Gossett Jr. goes into greater detail about being cast in “Take a Giant Step”, and the culture that produced this type of play. Gossett sang in a group called the Gospel Brothers. The Gospel Brothers participated in gospel competitions against Ray Charles, Al Hibler, The Original Five Blind Boys, Dixie Hummingbirds, Sam Cooke, Jackie Wilson, and The Mighty Clouds of...
Joy. Gossett recalls the beginning of his television career as being cast in “The Red Buttons Show”, followed by “Seargent Bilko”, and then “You are There,” hosted by Walter Cronkite. Gossett recalls trying out for The New York Knicks but later deciding to perform in “A Raisin in the Sun” instead of playing basketball professionally. Gossett concludes this portion of the interview with a discussion of the Harlem Renaissance and his relationship with Frederick O’Neill.

Louis Gossett Jr. remembers traveling to Wilmington, Delaware with actress Shirley Booth to audition for a play. While in Wilmington Gossett recalls experiencing his first instance of racism when he was refused service at a restaurant. Gossett shifts the discussion to the color lines that were apparent in the 1960s California television industry. Gossett was one of the first African Americans to have a hotel room at the Beverly Hills Hotel, a situation that caused the Beverly Hills police to handcuff him to a tree while they checked with hotel administration to verify his residency at the hotel. Gossett goes on to discuss his being cast as Copee Johnson in his first major movie “The Landlord” directed Hal Aspirin. The first movie Gossett was ever in was ‘The Bush Baby” directed by John Trent which was shot in Kenya and Tanzania.

Louis Gossett Jr. discusses the power and political history of Patrice Lumumba and United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld. Gossett talks about the time he spent in London working for a Shakespeare company called The Old Vic Company. He also describes the origins and impact of “Roots”, his role as Fiddler and Alex Haley. Gossett goes on to talk about his surprise as being cast as Sergeant Emil Foley in “An Officer and a Gentleman,” because he was the only African American actor that auditioned for the part. He divulges the little known fact that the inspiration for Emil Foley came from a man name Richard Dawer, the head of the Marine Corp Recruit Depot in San Diego, California. Gossett praises Magic Johnson for his business investments and his initiative to gentrify African American communities. He believes that African Americans must financially invest in themselves in order to give back to the American society.

Louis Gossett Jr. describes the irony of winning an Oscar in 1982 for his part in "An Officer and a Gentleman", but not being able to find work afterwards. Around the same time, Gossett began to party a lot, consuming various illicit drugs, and socializing with an unsavory mix of people. Gossett claims that he stopped partying when he reconnected with God. Gossett discusses the dual personality he has, one side is his public image and the other suffers in private at home. He then recalls the acting methods he used in many of his films such as; "Sadat", "The Father Clements Story" and The Principle. Gossett acknowledges being type cast in most films as a mentor. Gossett discusses some of the projects he is working on such as; "The Liberators 761st Tank Regiment", "Haile Selassie", "Cleopatra", "Kwame Nkrumah", and "Timbuktu".

Louis Gossett Jr. discusses the importance of producing films that tell the African American side of mainstream history, including such historic people as Hannibal. He then reflects on some of the productions he has been in such as "Captive Heart: The James Mink Story", "Lackawanna Blues", and "Stargate: SG-1". Gossett shares his desire to provide a venue for African American writers in film and TV. He reflects on how African Americans can become equal in Hollywood by owning their own production companies. Gossett aspires to one day play Lincoln Perry (also known as Stepin' Fetchit) in an effort to clear his name of the Uncle Tom/Coon image. He continues to discuss Perry at length all the while continuing to cite the importance of clearing his name and elevating his public persona. Gossett explains why he thinks his strongest performances as an actor were in “Diggstown” and “Enemy Mine”.

Louis Gossett Jr. discusses his acting method in great detail. He describes the sources for his material, the challenge of making acting appear fresh although he is a learned actor, and the differences between movies and made for television movies. Gossett lists his favorite actors and actresses: Sidney Poitier, Marlon Brando, Anthony Quinn, Robert DeNiro, Al Pacino, Meryl Streep, and Jane Fonda. In closing, Gossett narrates photographs of his family and friends.
