Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Newspaper publisher and former congressional staff member Jerome Whyatt “Jerry” Mondesire was born October 10, 1949, in Harlem, New York. Mondesire’s working class parents, Jerome Alexis Mondesire, a Dominican Garveyite, and Winnifred Taylor Mondesire of South Carolina, emphasized education. Mondesire attended P.S. 88 and Junior High School 172; he graduated from Martin Van Buren High School in Queens in 1968, where he was a member of the NAACP
High School Youth Council. Mondesire attended City Colleges of New York, where he studied journalism and was a student activist and volunteer with SNCC in 1969.

Mondesire covered the Black October killings of Maryland State Senator James Turk Scott and “Pee Wee” Matthews for the Baltimore Sun in 1973. At the Philadelphia Inquirer in 1974, Mondesire covered Mayor Frank Rizzo’s strip-searching of the Black Panthers. At the Inquirer, Mondesire became assistant city desk editor, turning to politics full-time in 1977. Mondesire was later chosen to work as chief of staff for William H. Gray’s successful congressional campaign. As Congressman Gray’s top aide, Mondesire influenced and shaped policy; he was instrumental in the 1985 national Stop The Springboks! Campaign, and helped to write the South African sanctions legislation for Congress. In 1991, Mondesire started his own weekly newspaper, The Philadelphia Sunday Sun. In 1992, after Congressman Gray retired, Mondesire acquired the Philadelphia Sun newspaper including the online edition. Mondesire also hosted the FreedomQuest, a local public and political affairs talk show on Philadelphia cable television. Mondesire was elected president of Philadelphia’s NAACP chapter where he increased membership to over 5,000. Under Mondesire the NAACP overturned the ex-felon disenfranchisement law in 1999. Mondesire remained active in welfare to work training, health care, youth violence and police brutality.

Mondesire passed away on October 4, 2015.

Video Oral History Interview with The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire, Section A2005_158_001_001, TRT: 0:29:00 2005/07/11

The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire was born on October 14, 1949 to Winnifred Taylor and Jerome A. Mondesire in Harlem, New York. Mondesire’s paternal grandfather was born to a French priest and his African housekeeper, and was given his father’s surname. Mondesire’s paternal grandfather was also well-educated and owned a plantation and an ice factory on Saint Kitts while his wife worked as baker. Mondesire’s father was born in 1893 in Dominica and grew up in Saint Kitts. He immigrated to the U.S. in 1912. In New York City, he worked as an elevator operator, and later, as a sleeping car porter. Mondesire’s mother was born in Charleston, South Carolina, where she worked as a domestic. She then moved with her mother and sisters to Harlem, and worked in the garment industry. In the 1940s, she met Mondesire’s father at a West Indian dance. As a single mother, she ensured that Mondesire received a good education. Mondesire describes his early impressions of Harlem, including the African National Memorial Bookstore. African Americans in the newspaper industry--Interviews.
The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire’s mother lived in Harlem while he lived with other New York City families so he could attend better schools. At P.S. 88 in the Bronx, his fifth grade teacher used music in her lessons and took the class on field trips to cultural festivals. Growing up, Mondesire was shy and bookish. In Queens, he attended J.H.S. 172, followed by Martin Van Buren High School, where he studied Russian and considered an engineering career. After his mother’s death, he was raised by his father. Despite being a former a Garveyite, his father disapproved of Mondesire’s civil rights activism when it took a more radical bent. Mondesire attended the City College of New York where he joined SNCC and traveled to Lowndes County, Alabama to help elect the first black sheriff. He describes the Apollo Theater and New York City’s music scene where, in Central Park, he saw Bobbi Humphrey jam on stage with Herbie Mann. He also remembers his family’s first TV and being invited to a Weather Underground meeting.

The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire joined the NAACP Youth Council when he was in high school. While attending the City of College of New York, he developed his interest in journalism and participated in the Civil Rights Movement. Upon graduating in 1971, he received a fellowship from the Washington Journalism Center to intern for The New York Times in Washington, D.C., and this internship led to his hiring at The Baltimore Sun.
Assigned to write obituaries for Baltimore’s black residents, Mondesire contacted a black funeral director and learned the paper historically neglected to cover deaths of the city’s African American population.
Mondesire also describes his coverage of the Black October organization, which sought to eradicate Baltimore’s drug culture, and the murder of James “Turk”
Scott, a Maryland politician and drug dealer. He remembers his experiences traveling to the South, as a child and with SNCC. He also describes the impact of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.’s assassination in Harlem.

Video Oral History Interview with The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire, Section A2005_158_001_004, TRT: 0:28:10 2005/07/11

The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire worked as a journalist for The Baltimore Sun where he covered Black October’s activities targeting Baltimore drug dealers in the early 1970s. He reflects upon Black October’s violent tactics, as well as Baltimore’s drug culture. In 1973, he began working for The Philadelphia Inquirer where he covered Philadelphia City Hall and Mayor Frank Rizzo. However, when his performance was negatively evaluated during a management training program, he left the paper to work as chief of staff for HistoryMaker William H. Gray, III. In that position, Mondesire contributed to passing legislation to fund social programs. He also advocated for the release of Nelson Mandela from prison and helped create Operation Understanding. When Gray left to join the UNCF, Mondesire founded a weekly African American newspaper, The Philadelphia Sunday Sun. He describes his and Gray’s contributions to the anti-apartheid movement, including calling for economic sanctions against South Africa.

The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire was chief of staff for HistoryMaker William H. Gray, III for twelve years, during which Philadelphia’s political landscape changed dramatically. In 1995, Mondesire founded the Philadelphia Sunday Sun, an African American newspaper, which acquired its own building. At this time, he began attending Philadelphia’s NAACP chapter meetings. With its membership dwindling, Mondesire wanted to rejuvenate its status; and, in 1997, he ran for president of the chapter. After discovering and revealing a damaging letter written by his opponent to Roy Wilkins, Mondesire’s slate went on to win the election. During his presidency, the chapter expanded its membership and fostered the development of several programs, such as ACT-SO, welfare-to-work training and anti-violence campaigns. Mondesire talks about long-term solutions to violence and HistoryMaker Dr. W. Wilson Goode, Sr.’s involvement in bombing the activist group MOVE. He also describes a visit to Pennsylvania’s Graterford Prison.

Video Oral History Interview with The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire, Section A2005_158_001_006, TRT: 0:21:40 2005/07/11

The Honorable Jerome W. Mondesire describes his visit to Pennsylvania’s Graterford Prison where he encountered a grandfather, father and son who were all serving life sentences. In this context, he considers the issue of violence for African American youth. He also describes the challenges he encountered as the president of the Philadelphia NAACP chapter and remembers prominent NAACP leaders, such as Vernon Dahmer and Daisy Bates. In talking about his relationship with mayor of Philadelphia John F. Street, Mondesire notes how, despite their previous conflicts, they both have collaborated to support programs like ACT-SO. Mondesire describes his hopes and concerns for the African American community, and reflects upon his life and legacy. He describes his hope that younger generations consider running for political office, his children and how he would like to be remembered.
