Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Former National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) basketball official William C. Baxter, Jr. was born on May 16, 1940 in Harlem, New York at Columbian Presbyterian Hospital. His parents were Christine Juanita Segee Baxter Phillips and William C. Baxter, Sr. Baxter's father owned a hat business in New York City. Baxter attended St. Augustine College on a basketball scholarship and received his B.A. degree in physical education in 1962. During the 1960s, he played guard in the summer pro-leagues and began officiating high school games in New York City. In 1972, Baxter passed the examination to become a college referee and began officiating for the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC). In 1975, Baxter received his M.A. degree in recreation and education from Herbert Lehman College in New York City.

Baxter has worked as one out of approximately twelve African American officials in the New York-New Jersey region. He is also one of the first African Americans to become a basketball official for major college games. Baxter officiated at major annual tournaments for the NCAA. At the same time, Baxter served as Director of Recreation for the Department of Parks and Recreation in the Bronx, New York for thirty-seven years. In 2000, Baxter retired as an ECAC official, but continued to serve as a referee at the high school and junior college levels.

Baxter is married to Thelma Baxter. They reside in Englewood, New Jersey. They have two daughters, Dana and Dawn.

William Baxter was born on May 16, 1940 in Harlem, New York to Christine Segee Phillips and William Baxter, Sr. Baxter's mother was born in 1917 in Columbia, South Carolina, but moved to Harlem at age ten. His maternal grandmother, the daughter of a slave and a slave-owner of German and Irish descent, was also born in Columbia. She was an excellent cook. Baxter's father was born in 1909 in Henderson, North Carolina to Pauline Garland Baxter and Dr. John E. Baxter. Baxter's father moved to New York City to attend Renard School of Embalming, but he never obtained his license. Baxter's parents owned and operated Baxter's Hats until World War II forced them out of business. Baxter's father worked as a cab driver, then reopened the store in the 1960s. Baxter grew up as the oldest of four siblings in Harlem. Baxter was the director of recreation for the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation for thirty-seven years, and officiated basketball games at the high school and college levels for thirty years.

William Baxter enjoyed flavored ice treats, music and dances as a child. Most people in his Harlem neighborhood worked as domestics. Baxter remembers walking to school in the 1947 blizzard only to find it closed. Baxter first attended the private Little Red School House and Elisabeth Irwin High School in New York City until his parents could no longer afford the tuition. Baxter transferred to P.S. 68, then P.S. 157, where he sang Negro spirituals in glee club. When Baxter did not make the basketball team at Cooper Junior High School, his mentor, Holcombe Rucker, coached him, and Baxter improved his skills. Instead of joining the basketball team at Commerce High School, Baxter worked as a messenger and as a page at the George Bruce Library to help support his family. A social worker advised him to pursue work instead of higher education. Refusing to give up his dreams of college and professional basketball, Baxter instead attended St. Augustine's College in Raleigh, North Carolina on a basketball scholarship.

William Baxter played point guard in the championship tournament at St. Augustine's College in Raleigh, North Carolina, where his team placed second. His toughest college professor was Julia E. Delany, daughter of Henry Delaney and sibling of the Delaney sisters. During his summer breaks, Baxter worked as a playground assistant for the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation. In the late 1960s, Baxter played for the Eastern Professional Basketball League Trenton Colonials and Wilkes-Barre Barons. As a semi-pro athlete, he played with K.C. Jones, John Williamson and Julius "Dr. J." Erving. He married his wife, Thelma Baxter, in 1964, and his two daughters were born in 1970 and 1975, respectively. After a brief stint teaching, Baxter returned to the recreation department to direct the Tompkins Corners Cultural Center, then the J. Rozier Hansborough Recreation Center. He was promoted to borough recreation director of the Bronx, and received his master's degree in recreation from Lehman College.

William Baxter had to resolve disputes between various ethnic communities as manager of the St. James Recreation Center in New York City. As recreation director for the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation, Baxter was responsible for staffing, programming, and budgets. Baxter's college basketball experience led to his interest in basketball officiating, although there were not many minorities in the field at the time. The application process was difficult, but Baxter passed the test on his first try. Through the Sports United Boro-Wide Officials Association, Baxter started officiating junior varsity basketball and playground games in 1972. After a few years of officiating high school basketball, Baxter applied to referee college games. He officiated his first games at Pratt Institute and Queens College in New York City. The job required him to stay in shape as he made calls on the plays. Baxter talks about fellow basketball officiates David Day and John Purvis, and his wife's educational career.

William Baxter retired from the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation in 1999 and from collegiate basketball officiating in 2000. During his twenty-eight year career, Baxter officiated the high school finals at Madison Square Garden in New York City, received an official of the year award from the Public Schools Athletic League, and plaques for officiating Division I and II basketball tournaments. Baxter describes one of his role models, John Purvis, a fellow manager for the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation. Baxter shares his advice for young people, describes those he has helped, and talks about his admiration for his wife, Thelma Baxter. He reflects upon his life, his hopes and concerns for the African American community and how he would like to be remembered.
