Ilyasah Shabazz was born on July 22, 192 in Brooklyn, New York to Betty Shabazz and Malcolm X. Her mother was born on May 28, 1934 in Pinehurst, Georgia to Ollie Sanders and Shelman Sandlin, an unmarried couple. Sandlin was of Native American ancestry and owned a cotton and pecan plantation. Sanders moved to Detroit, leaving Betty Shabazz to be raised by her aunt and grandmother. In her early teens, Betty Shabazz joined her mother in Detroit, but the reunion was not happy. Helen and Lorenzo Malloy then became foster parents to Shabazz's mother. The Malloys owned a shoe repair shop and were active members at Bethel AME Church. Betty Shabazz attended Tuskegee Institute, but left after a year. Shabazz's father, Malcolm X, was born on May 19, 1925 in Omaha, Nebraska to Louise Norton Little, who was from Grenada, and Earl Little, a Garveyite. Little was killed by the Ku Klux Klan after advocating for the rights of African Americans. As a result, Shabazz's paternal grandmother suffered a nervous breakdown.

Ilyasah Shabazz's paternal grandmother was admitted to Kalamazoo State Hospital. Shabazz's father, Malcolm X, and his siblings were then raised by their older brother and sister, Hilda and Wilfred Little, until the family land was taken and Shabazz's father was placed in a group home. He was well-liked in school, but dropped out to live with his half-sister, Ella Little-Collins, in Boston. In 1946, he was arrested for stealing a watch and received a longer sentence because he had a white girlfriend. While X was in prison, his brothers, Reginald and Wilfred, wrote to him about their conversion to the Nation of Islam, and he joined the religion as well. After his release in 1952, he moved to New York City and became the head of Mosque No. 7. Shabazz's mother was in Brooklyn for nursing school and met X at a mosque. They married and had six children together. Shabazz describes how her paternal grandmother instilled a love of learning in her children and shares her few early memories of her father.

Ilyasah Shabazz remembers influential teachers at St. Joseph Montessori School in Mount Vernon, New York and the Hackley School in Tarrytown, New York. Shabazz's mother sheltered Shabazz and her sisters and managed to educate all six children in private schools despite being a single mother. The family attended mosque every Sunday and saw plays, movies and concerts together. Shabazz remembers HistoryMaker Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, Curtis Mayfield, and other prominent African Americans visiting her childhood home. Shabazz spent summers at a camp in Vermont with Nina Simone's daughter, Lisa Stroud, who lived with the Shabazzes. Although Shabazz wanted to attend a historically black college, her mother enrolled her in the State University of New York in New Paltz. Shabazz recalls becoming aware of her racial identity while attending summer camp, learning about her father's life by reading his autobiography and being expected to fulfill her father's legacy as a revolutionary by other students at her college.

Ilyasah Shabazz attended SUNY New Paltz. Her notoriety as Malcolm X's daughter was overwhelming, so she moved off campus. After graduation, Shabazz wanted to attend Howard University College of Medicine, but a car accident curtailed her plans. She briefly worked as an English instructor at Mount Vernon High School, but decided she did not like teaching. She then served as the coordinator for the CUNY Preparatory Transitional High School Program, where she tutored high school dropouts, and edited the publication 'The Way We Feel.' Upon seeing Spike Lee's film, 'She's Gotta Have It,' Shabazz decided to contact Lee. She recalls their friendship and Lee jokingly ridiculing her for not being more like her father. Shabazz worked at the William Morris Agency and as a production assistant for Spike Lee. She describes how Lee's film, 'Malcolm X,' brought her father's autobiography to life. After receiving encouragement from her mother, Shabazz wrote her book, 'Growing Up X.' She recalls her mother's death in 1997.

Ilyasah Shabazz published her autobiography, 'Growing Up X,' in 2002, which she co-wrote with Kim McLarin. In 2005, she was able to fulfill her mother's plans to establish the Malcolm X and Dr. Betty Shabazz Memorial and Educational Center in New York City. She interviewed Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s son, Dexter King, to gain advice on opening the center. Upon finding out that her father's papers were about to be auctioned, Shabazz worked with the New York Public Library and HistoryMaker Howard Dodson to house the papers at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture. At the time of the interview, Shabazz was planning a speaking tour about empowerment for young people. Shabazz reflects upon the image of African American musical artists and their songs' messages. Shabazz describes her hopes for the African American community and recalls the smell of her mother's perfume from her childhood. She reflects upon her life, her father's legacy and the importance of history.
