Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Federal District Court Judge Myron Herbert Thompson was born on January 7, 1947 in Tuskegee, Alabama to Lawrence and Lillian Thompson. At age two, Thompson contracted polio and spent much of his time alone, finding solace in jazz and classical music. He attended Tuskegee Institute High School where he was named class salutatorian in 1965. Thompson received his B.A. degree in political science from Yale University in 1969 and his J.D. degree from Yale Law School in 1972.

After graduation, Thompson became the first African American Assistant Attorney General for the State of Alabama. He served in this position for two years before going into private practice in Dothan, Alabama. Thompson’s firm handled labor law, civil rights, school desegregation, sex discrimination and First Amendment cases.

President Jimmy Carter nominated Thompson to the bench of the United States District Court, Middle District of Alabama. He was confirmed by the U.S. Senate and received his appointment in September of 1980. At age thirty-three, he was the youngest member of the bench. Thompson served as Chief Justice from 1991 to 1998.

Thompson presides over the same court room where many landmark civil rights cases were argued and decided. He had the court restored to stand as a testament to history. Thompson also made national headlines when he ordered Alabama Supreme Court Justice Roy Moore to remove a monument of the Ten Commandments from the rotunda of the State of Alabama’s courthouse. He remains as much of an active legal scholar as his position permits, often calling for the executive and legislative branches to accept more responsibility for constitutional oversight that too often is left as the responsibility of judges. Thompson has served on the bench for twenty-seven years.

Myron Thompson was interviewed by The HistoryMakers on March 20, 2007.

Myron Thompson was born on January 7, 1947 in Tuskegee, Alabama. His father, Lawrence Thompson, Sr., was born in Birmingham, Alabama to Lawrence Thompson and his wife, both of whom died when Thompson’s father was young. Thompson knew his step-grandmother, Myrtis (ph.) Thompson, a teacher. Thompson’s father worked as a shoe repair man, waiter, stock broker, and salesman after separating from his wife and moving to New York City when Thompson was five. Thompson’s mother, Lillian Glanton Thompson Buford, was born to John Henry Glanton and his wife. Glanton was a farmer with a black mother and white father, who sent all of his daughters away to high school because there were no black high schools in the area. He later moved to Dothan, Alabama, where he started a school and a real estate business. Thompson’s mother attended the Tuskegee Institute for high school and college, and later became a secretary and a registrar for the Institute. In 1949, when Thompson was two years old, he contracted polio.

Myron Thompson grew up around the campus of the Tuskegee Institute in Tuskegee, Alabama, where he was treated for his polio by Dr. John Chenault. Thompson reflects on the impact that polio had on his childhood, including how it affected others’ views of him and encouraged his enjoyment of reading, music, and ballet. He also reflects on the lessons he learned from his mother about class, gender equality, and his responsibility to give back to the African American community. When Thompson was in fifth grade, his mother married Kenneth Buford, a minister at Butler Chapel A.M.E. Zion Church. Thompson remembers the church as a center for Civil Rights activities in Tuskegee, particularly those concerning voting rights and school desegregation. Thompson attended the Children’s House on the Tuskegee Institute campus for elementary school, and Tuskegee Institute High School. Around seventh grade, he and his family moved across town to be closer to his step-father’s church, forcing Thompson to take the bus to school.

Myron Thompson grew up in Tuskegee, Alabama with his mother, step-father, and an older brother named Lawrence Thompson, Jr. As a child, he was active in Jack and Jill. He was also a voracious reader. In 1961, his mother insisted that Thompson attend public school and he enrolled at Tuskegee Institute High School, where he excelled. He remembers his high school English teacher as well as his third grade teacher, Mrs. Perry, at the Children’s House. While he was aware of President Kennedy’s assassination and the March on Washington, Thompson was not politically active in high school. Thompson graduated in 1965 and enrolled at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. During a summer trip to Martha’s Vineyard with a friend, Thompson describes the comment made by his Yale classmate’s mother about his being different since he was African American. Thompson reflects on his lack of political involvement also as an undergraduate student at Yale University.

Myron Thompson remembers his exposure to film, classical music, and ballet at the Tuskegee Institute. He later received his B.A. degree from Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut in 1969 and then enrolled at Yale Law School, where his classmates included Hillary Clinton, Bill Clinton, and Clarence Thomas. After Black Panther Bobby Seale was arrested in New Haven, Thompson wrote a letter questioning whether he could receive a fair trial. During his summers at Yale Law School, Thompson worked as a legal intern on Wall Street. After receiving his J.D. degree in 1972, Thompson became the first black assistant attorney general in Alabama’s history under Bill Baxley and remained in this office until 1974, when he started his own private practice in Dothan, Alabama. As a lawyer, he became adept at arguing cases in front of the renowned Federal District Court Judge Frank Johnson; and, in 1980, Thompson was appointed to replace Johnson as Judge of the United States District Court of the Middle District of Alabama.

Myron Thompson married Ann Oldham in 1979. In 1980, he replaced Frank Johnson as Judge of the United States District Court of the Middle District of Alabama after the first candidate, noted Civil Rights lawyer Fred Gray, was unable to pass the U.S. Senate confirmation hearing. Thompson was appointed by President Jimmy Carter, and confirmed by the Senate within the span of four months at the age of thirty-three. Thompson reflects on the major cases he has ruled on throughout his career as a judge, including those concerning the use of deadly force by police officers, the special education system in Alabama, discrimination by gender and sexual orientation, voting rights, and cruel and unusual punishments in Alabama prisons. In 2001, Thompson gained national attention when he ordered Alabama Supreme Court Chief Justice Roy Moore to remove a monument of the Ten Commandments from the Alabama Judicial Building. Thompson talks about his family and shares a message for future generations.
