Deborah A. Elam was born on June 1, 1961 in New Orleans, Louisiana to Jeanne Cunningham Augustine and Henry Augustine, Sr. Her maternal grandfather owned a laundry service in New Orleans’ Irish Channel neighborhood, and her grandmother was an elementary school principal. Elam’s mother was born in 1930, and grew up in a large household in New Orleans. She graduated from McDonogh No. 35 Senior High School, one of the city’s few all-black public high schools, and majored in social studies education at Dillard University. She was also a talented seamstress. Elam’s father was born in Joyce, Louisiana in 1919. He moved to New Orleans to find employment, and met Elam’s mother at Pilgrims Rest Baptist Church No. 2. Elam grew up in a close-knit neighborhood, and lived across the street from Paul Laurence Dunbar Elementary School, where she excelled at reading with her parents’ encouragement. The school integrated when she was in the fourth grade.

Deborah A. Elam began her education at Martinez Kindergarten School, a private school for gifted African American students in New Orleans, Louisiana. Later, while she was a student at Paul Laurence Dunbar Elementary School, Elam took ballet lessons; read at home; and participated in a local Girl Scout troop. She also visited her maternal grandfather, Joseph Cunningham’s luncheonette. Elam continued her schooling at Ursuline Academy, an all-girls, Catholic high school, which had better resources than her previous all-black school. She served as student body president during her freshman and junior years, and participated in New Orleans’ debutante balls. Upon graduating in 1979, Elam received a scholarship to Xavier University of Louisiana in New Orleans. There, she pledged Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, and majored in pre-medical studies. Eventually, Elam became unhappy with the school’s small size, and transferred to Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge, where she changed her major to sociology.

Deborah A. Elam was a student at Xavier University of Louisiana in New Orleans when the city’s first African American mayor, Ernest Morial, was in office. She eventually transferred to Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. During this time, she aspired to success, but had not decided on a career. Elam entered the public administration graduate program at Southern University and Agricultural and Mechanical College in Baton Rouge, where Wiley Harris of General Electric (GE) recruited her as an intern. She worked in the human resources (HR) department at General Electric Information Services in Rockville, Maryland, and incorporated her research on GE’s compensation and benefits into her master’s degree thesis. Upon graduating in 1987, Elam completed GE’s two-year human resources training program, and returned to Rockville to work at GE headquarters for two years. After a six-month rotation at GE Aviation in Evendale, Ohio, Elam was assigned to an HR field position in Deborah A. Elam worked as a human resources (HR) manager for General Electric (GE) in Atlanta, Georgia in the early 1990s. In this role, Elam addressed the concerns of GE employees as GE divested from one of its subsidiaries. When Elam’s fiancé, Archie Elam, transferred to Fort Bragg, North Carolina for his U.S. Army career, Elam moved to Raleigh, North Carolina, where she worked in HR at GE Capital Mortgage Corporation for two years. At this time, around 1993, Elam participated in one of GE’s first diversity training exercises. She then became an HR manager for GE Capital Insurance Services in Stamford, Connecticut, at the same time as she became pregnant with her first daughter. Given her seniority and expertise, Elam served as HR managing director for GE Capital Market Services, which employed Wall Street bankers, a demographic she had not managed previously. After expressing interest in a higher level opportunity, Elam led HR for GE Corporate Finance during a period of growth and expansion.

Deborah A. Elam became a senior executive at General Electric (GE) in 2002. She then filled Steven Thorne’s role as the diversity leader for GE Capital in Fairfield, Connecticut. At the time of the interview, Elam had been in the position for over four years. She was responsible for mentoring the company’s diverse talent, and ensuring that GE’s leadership was diverse as well. In 2006, she was also named an officer of the company. Elam talks about GE’s African American executives, like Lloyd G. Trotter and Arthur H. Harper; African American female corporate leaders like Paula Madison and Carla Harris; and her mentors at GE, including Wiley Harris and Anne Nohara Abaya. In addition to her employment at GE, Elam served as president of the Fairfield County Chapter of The Links, Incorporated, and was recognized by the White House Project for her corporate service. She reflects upon motherhood and her identity as an African American woman; the importance of history; and how she would like to be remembered.
