Arthur Holmes, Jr. slates his interview and lists his favorites. His mother Grace Lou Bradley Holmes was born January 14, 1913 in Pulaski, Tennessee. Grace had white ancestry from her grandfather. Grace matriculated at the eighth grade but earned a G.E.D. and taught herself typing. She was active within the AME Zion Church often serving as secretary. She presided over the women’s missionary society. The family owned land in Decatur, Alabama but moved north following the TVA as it built dams. Arthur Holmes, Sr. and Grace married young after meeting outside a pool hall. In Decatur both extended families lived in adjacent or adjoining lots. With few facilities for blacks, children and adults made their own fun or hosted house parties. Holmes was in the National Honors Society and played basketball. His religious upbringing and the example of his parents contributed to his strong moral foundation and work ethic. Holmes idolized black athletes of the day. Despite segregation Holmes did not feel cheated out of a good education.

Holmes was active in the “High Y” affiliated YMCA activities like basketball, which he played in high school and college. During World War II Arthur did well as a carpenter for the Oak Ridge facilities. The eventful death of Dorie Miller profoundly affected him psychologically. Segregation was an accepted reality but he welcomed army desegregation. At Hampton University he majored chemistry and minored in biology but graduated with a C+ average. He did far better at missile and nuclear weapons officer training and staff college. The army paid for his MBA. Five out of his first ten years in the army were spent teaching electronics at the artillery school and guided missiles and nuclear weapons at ordnance school. From 1956-59 he was posted to Kaiserlautern, Germany. It was difficult to serve in an integrated army but not able to mingle in segregated states. He joined the Ordnance Corps and taught at the Aberdeen Proving Ground from 1960-1964.

Holmes’ unit assembled nuclear weapons during a contentious time in the Cold War. His classes covered the logistical matters of resupply and maintenance of weapons and equipment; Holmes variously commanded these dedicated units throughout the country. Lieutenant Colonel Holmes commanded the 62nd Maintenance Battalion in Vietnam for six months and oversaw various logistical divisions. His life was very rarely at risk. He enrolled at the Naval War College and joined the Joint Staff where he served as a staff officer in the Guidance and Procedures branch. In 1974 Colonel Holmes was chief of the ordnance branch for the army; he was surprised at the appointment. One of his responsibilities was to select officers in the ordnance branch and, in the downsizing of the army following the end of conflict in Vietnam, dismissing career officers, too. Black colonels were rare and generals were non-existent until Vietnam concluded.

The downsizing of the army was conducted carefully through committee work that examined every service member’s record. Just like equipment, soldiers need to continually upgrade themselves and meet or exceed increasing expectations placed on them. Holmes met Colin Powell as a major and again later when they each were Colonels and executive officers for defense secretaries. Holmes worked under Secretary of the Army, Clifford Alexander. Before this Holmes commanded a Division Support Command. The XO appointment came easily partly because of a special efficiency report drafted by the commanding general from his time in Germany. Personnel management and logistics were changing in the new All Volunteer Army, which increasingly retained blacks and a worsening drug problem. In Vietnam he encountered numerous discipline problems with duty shirking, drugs, and an attempted fragging. He did not agree with President Carter’s decision to grant amnesty to draft dodgers. He visited Panama several times during the Torrijos-Carter Panama Canal treaty negotiations. Holmes was promoted to Brigadier General in 1979, the same year as Colin Powell. He was very pleased to serve as the deputy commander of the Tank Automotive Command.

Holmes oversaw the development, production, procurement, and support of tank automotive equipment including tanks, personnel carriers, and other armed vehicles; he participated in the development of the Apache helicopter and the HMMWV; his MBA skill sets prepared him very well. As Brigadier General, Holmes dealt with contractors and R&D. Holmes retired in 1987 as a Major General and became an executive of Automotive Science Group. He left there in 1995. His training and experience in the army prepared him for management and interacting with its military clients. Holmes’ logistics experience prepared him as commissioner for the Montgomery County Planning Board, a county project called Go Montgomery, then director of Public Works and Transportation. Holmes is concerned that black young people are complacent and unwittingly falling victim to lingering extant prejudices. He regrets being outside the country for most of the Civil Rights movement. Holmes remarried in the mid 1980s to a woman named Wilma. He would like to be remembered as an individual who was compassionate, fair, and did the best he could for himself and others.
