Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Music composer and music producer Camara Yero Kambon was born on February 4, 1973, in Baltimore, Maryland to Anana Maisha Kambon, a preschool teacher, and Kwame Sietu Kambon, an artist. At the age of two, Kambon started studying drums. He moved to the piano at age four and composed his first musical riffs by the age of six. While living in Baltimore, Maryland, Kambon attended Cross Country Elementary and attended Fallstaff Middle School where he began to play other instruments besides the piano. After graduating from middle school, Kambon attended St. Paul's School for Boys in Lutherville, Maryland. In 1983, Kambon enrolled in the Peabody Preparatory School in Baltimore, studying jazz, classical piano and composition. Kambon graduated from Berklee College of Music in Boston, Massachusetts in 1994 where he studied music production, music engineering and film scoring. While there, he composed music for the Emmy nominated films, Dancing: New Worlds, New Forms and Malcolm X: Make it Plain.

In 1996, Kambon won an Emmy Award for the music he composed for the HBO film, Sonny Liston: The Mysterious Life and Death of a Champion. At the age of twenty-three, he was the youngest composer ever to receive a national Emmy Award. Kambon then became head of Influx Entertainment, a musical production company in Hollywood, California, specializing in film, television and records. Kambon has worked as the composer for two television series, A Different World and Living Single. He has also worked as a keyboard player for producer and rapper, Dr. Dre. In addition, Kambon composed Korikabaya, which was performed by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

In 1998, Kambon received his second Emmy nomination for the HBO documentary, Where Have You Gone Joe DiMaggio? Kambon received three Grammy nominations in 2001 for co-writing the Mary J. Blige hit, Family Affair; for his keyboard work on Nelly Furtado's Whoa, Nelly!; and for his contribution to Eve's album, Scorpion. Two years later, Kambon received another Emmy nomination for A City on Fire: Tigers of '68.

Camara Yero Kambon was interviewed by The HistoryMakers on September 18, 2008.

Camara Kambon was born on February 4, 1973 in Baltimore, Maryland to Anana Kambon and Kwame Kambon. His great-great-grandfather had Native American and white ancestry, and originated in Prince George's County in Maryland. Kambon's maternal grandparents, Yolanda Proctor and Leon J. Proctor, met at Morgan College in Baltimore, where his mother was born in 1953. She was raised in the Catholic faith, and attended the St. Ann Catholic Church and Mercy High School. His maternal aunt, Gwynette Proctor, later became a Catholic nun. Kambon's mother was politically active in the 1970s; and, during that time, met Kambon's father. They became involved with civil rights activists Maulana Karenga and Amiri Baraka, musician James Mtume and the Congress of Afrikan People. From the age of seven years old, Kambon had no contact with his father, and little contact with his paternal family. He and his brother, Khari Kambon, grew up in a tight knit community in Baltimore, in close proximity to their mother's family.

Camara Kambon was raised near the home of his maternal grandmother, Yolanda Proctor, the east side of Baltimore, Maryland. His father, Kwame Kambon, was a painter and Swahili teacher; while his mother, Anana Kambon, studied preschool education at Coppin State College. Kambon's mother began to notice his musical abilities when he was two years old. Three years later, his family moved to the northwest area of Baltimore, where he learned to read music, and took private music lessons from Odell Wilson, who was affiliated with the Agnihotra movement in Baltimore. From the age of six years old, Kambon performed with the band Satyadharma. He listened to the music of Bob Marley, the Bee Gees, John Coltrane, Abdullah Ibrahim, Sonny Rollins and Ahmad Jamal; as well as Kweisi Mfume's radio show, 'Two Way Talk.' Kambon was soon recognized as a musical prodigy, and was featured in the Baltimore Afro-American and The Baltimore Sun newspapers. He also recalls meeting Alice Coltrane in the mid-1990s.

Camara Kambon attended Cross Country Elementary School in Baltimore, Maryland, where he excelled in math. At eight years old, Kambon began studying classical and South American music at the Peabody Conservatory of Music. He joined the school band at Fallstaff Middle School, and played the timpani, xylophone and glockenspiel. With the encouragement of his mother, Anana Kambon, he performed at clubs like Left Bank Jazz Society, where he played the song 'St. Thomas' with Dizzy Gillespie. Kambon experienced racial discrimination for the first time at St. Paul's School, where there were few African American students. Nevertheless, he was elected president of the student council, and state treasurer of the Maryland Association of Student Councils. As a teenager, Kambon performed at the King of France, a venue in Annapolis, Maryland where he met his mentor, jazz musician Jack Pastorius. Kambon was also influenced by composer Stu Gardner, guitarist Pat Metheny, and pianists John Lewis and McCoy Tyner.
