Video Oral History Interview with Charles Russell Branham, Section A2008_119_001_001, TRT: 0:28:50

Charles Russell Branham was born on May 25, 1945 in Chicago, Illinois to Charles Hurd Branham Halthon and Joseph Branham. Branham’s paternal family descended from Portuguese immigrants who fled to Virginia during the Spanish Inquisition. In Georgia, his paternal ancestor, William Branham, was a minister, and his sister, Crystal Watson, was the mother of educator John Brown Watson. Branham’s paternal grandparents lived in Denison, Texas, where his father was born. They moved to Chicago, Illinois, where Branham’s paternal grandfather ministered at Olivet Baptist Church under pastor Lacy Kirk Williams, and his father became a minister as well. Branham’s maternal great-grandfather, John Hurd, fought in Mississippi’s 3rd U.S. Colored Cavalry during the Civil War. Branham’s maternal grandfather, William Hurd, moved to Tennessee, where Branham’s grandmother died in a fire shortly after his mother was born. His mother went on to attend LeMoyne College in Memphis, Tennessee, and became a teacher.

Charles Russell Branham’s mother was a teacher in Memphis, Tennessee, and met his father while he was attending a conference. They moved to Chicago, Illinois, where Branham and his sisters, twins Cathryn Branham and Carol Branham, were born. Branham’s family lived on Chicago’s South Side, where he attended the Stephen A. Douglas School. He was a good student, although he once skipped a week of school to go to the beach. After his parents’ divorce, Branham’s mother moved her children to her older sister’s home in Memphis, where her younger sister’s family was also living. In Memphis, Branham began the third grade at Lincoln Elementary School. He was close to his cousins and his uncle, Reverend Johnson, and often practiced preaching at home. Branham was a talkative child at school, but began reading instead when his fifth grade teacher seated him beside her desk. He went on to attend Manassas High School, where he participated in the American Legion Boys State.

Charles Russell Branham was the governor of Tennessee’s all-black American Legion Boys State, and gave a well-received speech at the convention in Nashville. Nevertheless, the white Boys State governor was chosen to attend Boys Nation. Branham marched for civil rights in segregated Memphis, Tennessee, but did not tell his mother, who feared for his safety. At church, Branham debated integration with his fellow students. He was popular at Manassas High School, and emceed a show with musician Isaac Hayes. Branham also worked for the Memphis World, a local African American newspaper, where he wrote a column about his fellow students, earning him money and the respect of his peers. Although he does not recall being mentored in high school, Branham was a successful student. The death of a friend in the Vietnam War dissuaded him from entering the U.S. Army after graduation. Instead, he enrolled at the mostly-white Rockford College in Rockford, Illinois, where he struggled during his freshman year.

Charles Russell Branham attended Rockford College, a conservative school in Rockford, Illinois, where his roommates often made racist comments. Branham was elected class president twice; and, as student body president, met gubernatorial candidate Ronald Reagan. Although Branham intended to study political science, he eventually switched to history, and gained confidence with Charles Russell Branham received funding for his graduate studies at the University of Chicago with help from historian John Hope Franklin. In his second year, Branham began teaching African American history at Chicago State College and Roosevelt University, and built his own curriculum. He also taught history at the Communiversity; befriended political activists like Bobby Rush and Oscar Brown, Jr.; and participated in sit-ins at the University of Chicago. In 1972, Branham was hired by Chicago’s WTTW-TV to write and host ‘The Black Experience,’ a documentary series about African American life. He interviewed scholars throughout the country, including Franklin and Herbert Gutman, a historian of slavery. He also met director John Tweedle at the station. The show received an Emmy Award after Branham returned to his graduate studies. Branham completed his dissertation on African American politics in Illinois, and was hired to teach at the University of Illinois in Chicago.

Charles Russell Branham was recruited to the University of Illinois at Chicago by historian Gilbert Osofsky, who died the summer before Branham began teaching. In the 1980s, Branham worked in local politics in Chicago, Illinois. He supported aldermanic candidates Albert Raby and Richard H. Newhouse, Jr., and testified about Chicago’s history of voter disenfranchisement in a case brought by the Political Action Conference of Illinois against the city, which led to redistricting of the city’s wards. He also contributed to the 1984 Democratic National Convention platform. Branham supported Harold Washington’s first mayoral campaign, and helped produce Washington’s radio commercials. After Washington’s death, Branham was hired to create an exhibit about him for the Harold Washington Library. Branham taught at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois until 1987, when he joined Chicago’s DuSable Museum of African American History as its senior historian. Branham also reflects upon his life and research.

Charles Russell Branham created an exhibition about the history of Provident Hospital in Chicago, Illinois, and donated the materials to the DuSable Museum of African American History after the hospital attempted to discard them. He also served as consultant for ‘The Killing Floor,’ a television program about labor unions in Chicago. In 2003, Branham testified on behalf of the City of Chicago when its affirmative action policies were challenged by local contracting companies. Although the city lost the lawsuit, it rewrote its policies so that the affirmative action programs remained in place. Branham describes his experiences of police harassment throughout his time in Chicago. On one occasion, he was attacked by a police officer with a gun, and his friends who were familiar with the police department advised him not to file a report to prevent retaliation. Branham also reflects upon his family and friends, his concerns for the African American community and his legacy.
