William Harvey was born on January 29, 1941 in Brewton, Alabama to Claudis Parker Harvey and W.D.C. Harvey. Harvey's maternal great-grandmother was a member of the Creek tribe. His maternal grandparents, Mamie Parker and William Parker, raised their children in Monroeville, Alabama, where Harvey's mother graduated as the salutatorian of the Bethlehem Industrial Academy. After the death of his maternal grandfather, his maternal grandmother relocated her family to Pensacola, Florida. Harvey's paternal great-grandfather was white, and his family was estranged from their white relatives. Harvey's father was the owner of the Harvey Builders firm and a prominent civil rights activist in southeast Alabama, where he served as president of the local NAACP and SCLC chapters. He often met with civil rights leaders like John L. LeFlore and A.D. King. In Brewton, Harvey's paternal uncle, Edd Hollinger, owned a barbershop with an all-white clientele; and Harvey was educated at the private Southern Normal School.

William Harvey grew up in Brewton, Alabama, where his father, W.D.C. Harvey, worked as a construction contractor in the black community. His father was also a leader of the local civil rights movement, and encouraged Harvey and his siblings to use white-only facilities despite the strict segregation laws. After kindergarten, Harvey enrolled at Brewton's Southern Normal School, a private, all-black boarding school founded by philanthropist James Dooley during Reconstruction. There, he played football and basketball, and was influenced by the institution's strict rules. Harvey earned a high school diploma in 1957, and matriculated at the Talladega College in Talladega, Alabama. With his classmate, Charles Ray, he founded a student civil rights group that became the model for SNCC. Around 1958, Harvey gave the opening remarks for Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s speech at the Dexter Avenue King Memorial Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. Later that night, the church was attacked by white supremacists.

William Harvey's father, W.D.C. Harvey, was a civil rights leader in Alabama. From an early age, Harvey witnessed threats of violence against his father, as well as his father's meetings with activists like A.D. King of the SCLC and John L. LeFlore, who founded the NAACP branch in Mobile, Alabama. Harvey studied history at Talladega College in Talladega, Alabama, where he organized a group of student activists. He led a student march in Anniston, Alabama after an African American man was beaten there for using a white waiting room. The demonstrators were attacked by white counter protestors, and the Ku Klux Klan threatened to besiege the campus of Talladega College; but, after the community armed the students with guns, the threats subsided. During this time, Harvey's group received the tacit approval of Talladega College President Arthur D. Gray. After graduating in 1961, Harvey joined the U.S. Army, and was assigned to serve as an official historian at the Seventh Army headquarters in Germany.

William Harvey enrolled in a master's degree program at Virginia State College in Petersburg, Virginia. There, he was influenced by Professor Edgar Toppin, a scholar of black history; and met Norma Baker Harvey, whom he later married. Harvey began a thesis on the black recipients of the Medal of Honor, but decided instead to study college administration at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, where he earned a degree in 1972. He was offered positions at Dartmouth College and the University of Connecticut at Storrs, but decided to devote his career to historically black schools. He served for two years as the assistant to the president of Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, and then became the vice president of the Tuskegee Institute in Tuskegee, Alabama. In 1980, Harvey was named the president of Hampton University in Hampton, Virginia, where he served for over three decades. During his tenure, he established high standards of behavior and service, and solicited input from the faculty and students.
