Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

 Former clerk of the United States House of Representatives Lorraine C. Miller was born in Fort Worth, Texas, to Lena Marie and Johnnie C. Miller. Miller was heavily involved in the Baptist Church as a child, and both of her parents believed ardently in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In the early 1970s, Miller enrolled at Jarvis Christian College outside of Dallas, but she quickly changed career paths and began attending the University of North Texas. She then graduated from North Texas in 1975 with her B.A. degree in political science.
Upon graduation, Miller worked as a high school government teacher in Fort Worth. She then decided to pursue a political career and worked as an intern for the Maryland Legislature in Washington, D.C. in the late 1970s. Soon after moving to Washington, she enrolled in classes at American University and started working for United States Congressman Jim Wright. Miller would go on to work for Wright for eleven years, including serving as his executive assistant when he was speaker of the house from 1987 to 1989. Then, she worked for House Speaker Tom Foley and U.S. Congressman John Lewis in the early 1990s. Miller would later attend Georgetown University and graduate with her executive M.B.A degree.

In the mid-1990s, Miller served two years in the White House as the deputy assistant to President William J. Clinton. She then served as the director of government relations for the Federal Trade Commission from 1995 to 1999. In 1999, Miller became chief of the Consumer Information Bureau of the Federal Communications Commission. Then, in 2001, she served as senior advisor to House Minority Whip Nancy Pelosi until 2007, when Pelosi named Miller the new clerk of the House of Representatives. Miller would become the first African American to both hold that seat and to serve as an officer of the U.S. House of Representatives. She held the seat until 2011.

In 2004, Miller was elected president of the Washington, D.C. branch of the NAACP. Then, in 2008, she was elected to the NAACP National Board of Directors.

Lorraine C. Miller was intervied by The HistoryMakers on July 27, 2013.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller was born on May 6, 1948 in Fort Worth, Texas to Lena Jones Miller and Johnnie Miller. Her maternal grandfather, James Jones, moved from Galveston, Texas to Winkler, Texas after the Galveston Hurricane of 1900. Miller’s mother attended school through the tenth grade in Winkler, and then completed her diploma in Fort Worth. She went on to become a hairdresser. Miller’s paternal grandfather, Cal Miller, was born in the rural town of Brushy Creek, Texas, where he worked as a farmer. Miller’s father and uncle left Brushy Creek to join the U.S. Army. After World War II, they used funding from the G.I. Bill and studied to become barbers. Miller’s father returned to Texas, while her uncle settled in New York City’s Harlem neighborhood, where he had disembarked upon returning from Europe. Years later, Miller worked as a legislative assistant to U.S. Representative Jim Wright, who patronized her father’s barbershop for over twenty years.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller and her sister, Maurietta Miller, were born and raised on the Southside of Fort Worth, Texas, in the predominantly African American neighborhood of Como. There, Miller and her family attended the Mount Zion Baptist Church, where she had opportunities for public speaking from a young age. She also sang in the choir, and took piano lessons for twelve years. Miller’s parents were members of the Fort Worth Tarrant County Branch NAACP, and often brought her to meetings led by the branch president, George D. Flemmings. During this time, the NAACP faced frequent attacks by the state government, and Texas Attorney General John Ben Shepperd attempted to ban the organization because of its involvement with the voting rights movement. At this point, Miller remembers accompanying her mother to the central polling place in Fort Worth, where the sheriff’s deputies and election judges tried to intimidate them. Miller graduated from Como Junior-Senior High School in 1966.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller grew up in Fort Worth, Texas, where she attended the segregated Como Elementary School during the 1950s. There, she developed an interest in literature, and became an avid reader. She went on to attend Como Junior-Senior High School, and aspired to a career in medicine from the age of fourteen years old. During the 1960s, the local African American community gained political power with the election of Leonard E. Briscoe, Sr. and Walter B. Barbour to the Fort Worth City Council. The city also attracted a negative stigma after the assassination of President John Fitzgerald Kennedy, who visited Fort Worth on the morning of his death. Miller participated in civil rights demonstrations in the area, where she was once spat upon by white counter protestors. After graduating from high school in 1966, Miller decided to enroll at the Jarvis Christian College in Hawkins, Texas.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller enrolled as a premedical studies major at the historically black Jarvis Christian College in 1966. When Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was assassinated in 1968, many of the students and faculty were frightened of white reprisals, as the Ku Klux Klan was active in Hawkins, Texas. As her studies progressed, Miller decided not to become a physician, and transferred to North Texas State University to study political science and be closer to her family. She worked as a grocery cashier to earn a living, and graduated in 1972. Miller then became a peer adviser and teacher at Arlington Heights High School and Trimble Tech High School in Fort Worth, Texas. After her mother’s death in 1977, she decided to pursue her dream of becoming a politician, and moved to Washington, D.C. At this point in the interview, Miller talks about the national political leadership of black women from Texas, like Barbara Jordan and Eddie Bernice Johnson.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller moved to Washington, D.C. in 1977, shortly after the election of President James Earl “Jimmy” Carter, Jr. With the help of Fort Worth City Councilman Jim Bagsby and State Representative Reby Cary, she secured a position in the office of U.S. Representative Jim Wright, where she served for eleven years. In 1980, Miller was responsible for organizing black voters in support of Wright’s reelection campaign. She noticed that Wright spent minimal campaign funds on Fort Worth’s black community, and instead rallied support by providing strong constituent services. Miller was promoted to a leadership staff position in the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, where she worked on the proposal to build a super collider in Waxahachie, Texas. In 1988, Wright was charged with ethics violations and resigned from the U.S. Congress. At this point, Miller describes the demographics of Jim Wright’s staff, and shares her strategies for political success.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller’s employer, Jim Wright, resigned his position as Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives in 1989. She considered joining the U.S. House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, but agreed to continue working as a legislative assistant under Wright’s successor, Tom Foley. In 1991, Miller was invited to join the congressional delegation to South Africa, where she spoke to Nelson Mandela about his resemblance to her paternal grandfather, James Jones. After the Republican Revolution of 1994, Miller secured a position at the White House under President Bill Clinton. She attended the program for Senior Managers in Government at Harvard University’s John F. Kennedy School of Government in 1995. Miller then secured a position at the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), where she worked on programs to stop identity theft. FTC Chairman Robert Pitofsky encouraged her to pursue an M.B.A. degree, which she completed at Georgetown University in 1998.

The Honorable Lorraine Miller served on the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) from 1995 to 1999. During that time, she supervised the mergers and breakups of telecommunication giants like Time Warner, Inc., Bell Telephone Company and AT&T Corporation. In 1999, FTC Chairman Robert Pitofsky decided to move Miller to the Federal Communications Commission, where she headed the Consumer Information Bureau under Chairman William E. Kennard. She was responsible for addressing over one hundred thousand consumer complaints, and investigated unregulated billing by telecommunications companies. Miller then returned to President Bill Clinton’s administration as the executive director of the White House Community Empowerment board. After the election of President George Walker Bush in 2000, Miller left the federal government to work with the American Federation of Teachers. At this point in the interview, she talks about the inefficiencies of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, and the movement to privatize education.
