Processing Information
Dr. James Hill was born on September 14, 1949 at Provident Hospital in Chicago, Illinois—the first black-owned and operated hospital established in the United States. His mother, Doretha Lowe, was born in Bolton, Mississippi, a one-block town in between Jackson and Vicksburg, Mississippi. Lowe was born out of wedlock and raised by her grandmother, Rosa Lee McCraven. Hill’s father, James Allen Hill, was also born in Bolton, Mississippi into a family of sharecroppers. Hill’s paternal grandfather, Charlie Hill migrated north from Mississippi to work in northern stockyards during the Great Depression. He earned enough money to purchase land and traveled back south to purchase and work his own farm. Hill’s paternal grandmother, Alberta Hill was a strict disciplinarian and worked as a school teacher. Hill’s parents married and migrated to Chicago before his birth. Hill, however, spent every summer until he was thirteen years old in Bolton, Mississippi.

Dr. James Hill shares his paternal family history. Hill’s grandfather purchased land in Bolton, Mississippi in 1927.
where he built a house, which was still standing at the time of the interview. Hill describes the two-bedroom home and its surrounding area. In the 1940s, Hill’s father, James Allen Hill, left Bolton to work at Campbell Soup Company in Upstate New York before moving to Chicago, Illinois. He later sent for Hill’s mother, Doretha Hill. They married in City Hall and lived on the South Side Chicago in the Bronzeville neighborhood. In the 1950s, the family moved to Chicago’s West Side. Hill describes the differences between the South and West Sides and his earliest childhood memories, including childhood trips from Chicago to segregated Mississippi. In 1958, Our Lady of the Angels School in Chicago caught fire, leading to multiple injuries and deaths. As Hill watched the aftermath on television, he decided that he wanted to become a physician.

Dr. James Hill grew up on the West Side of Chicago, Illinois in the 1950s, during white flight. He recalls spending his childhood within ten blocks of his family’s home and occasionally sleeping parked at the airport on hot summer nights, when it was too hot to sleep at home. Hill also spent significant time at the Boys Club, where he received mentorship from Northwestern University students. Hill attended Beidler Elementary School. He was a good student and favored by most teachers aside from having difficulty reading phonetically. Hill recalls another student, the son of a gang leader, hiding a gun in his desk during an inspection. Hill’s desk was not inspected and in gratitude for keeping the leader’s son out of trouble, the gang never targeted his family. Hill also recalls a story of getting into trouble after writing a rude note to the gang member’s aunt as well as the sights, sounds and smells of his childhood. He also talks about his family traditions and religious upbringing.

Dr. James Hill describes the cancellation of his reunion for Beidler Elementary School in Chicago, Illinois due to the low number of possible black male attendees. After Beidler, Hill attended Lane Technical College Preparatory High School. At the time, Lane Tech was a predominantly white institution. Hill’s father initially opposed his admission given the discrimination he might be subjected to, but let him attend anyway. Hill describes his experience at Lane Tech as well as a white librarian who treated him as a surrogate son. He also describes being inspired by black physicians such as Daniel Hale Williams. Hill was in high school at the height of the Civil Rights Movement and recalls his parents’ attitudes toward the movement, John F. Kennedy’s assassination, and Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King’s 1965 move to Chicago. Hill did not receive good counseling at Lane Tech, but he was recruited by Northwestern University and offered full financial aid, which he accepted. He enrolled in 1967 and studied biology.

Dr. James Hill describes his interest in science as an undergraduate student. Hill also talks about meeting and marrying his wife at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois during their sophomore year. While in school, Hill worked at the post office and rented an apartment on Chicago, Illinois’ North Side. Hill completed his undergraduate studies in three years and was admitted to Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine. Though he had not applied, his professors advocated for him to prevent him from being drafted into the Vietnam War. During medical school, Hill worked full time and missed classes, which prompted a professor to threaten to fail him. Hill recalls his fellow students at Feinberg and describes handling discrimination from professors. He recalls taking his family to see a cadaver in his anatomy lab and talks about the significance of organic chemistry to medical students. By the end of medical school, Hill elected to specialize in orthopaedics rather than neurosurgery.

Dr. James Hill remembers being racially profiled and arrested in the 1980s in Chicago, Illinois. Hill also talks about his medical rotations at Northwestern Memorial Hospital, Cook County Hospital, and others. After completing his orthopaedic residency at Northwestern Memorial, he completed post-graduate training in sports medicine in California. At the behest of his mentor, William J. Kane, Hill returned to Chicago in 1980, where he practiced orthopaedics and taught at Feinberg School of Medicine. He describes his duties as an attending physician and talks about papers he has published. He describes his clientele and the positions he held throughout the hospital as well as at the medical school, including as hospital chief of staff. He explains the function of Northwestern Health Care Corporation. Hill, HistoryMakers Dr. Augustus White and Dr. Carlton West, along with other black orthopaedic surgeons, founded the J. Robert Gladden Society to promote diversity in orthopaedics.

Dr. James Hill talks about being licensed to practice medicine in four states. He also recalls making a volunteer trip to Ethiopia in the late 1980s. While there, he wrote an article about patient care in war situations. He lived at a hospital in Addis Ababa and was rarely able to leave. Hill describes the state of orthopaedics at the time of the interview. Total joint replacements had increased significantly since he entered the field, although there were still large disparities in terms of the race of the patients. Hill also explains how doctors estimate how long knee replacements will last. He talks about the Rehabilitation Institute of Chicago, HistoryMakers and fellow orthopaedic surgeons, Dr. Augustus White and Dr. Carlton West, and reflects on the importance of culturally competent care. He talks about his wife and children and what they have taught him. He also reflects upon his life, future plans and legacy. He concludes by offering a message to future generations.
