Video Oral History Interview with Patricia Andrews-Keenan, Section A2014_030_001_001, TRT: 1:20:19 ?

Patricia Andrews-Keenan was born on July 19, 1954 in New Orleans, Louisiana to Pearlne Henderson Chapman and James Andrews. Her maternal grandfather was born to Doreatha Dempsey Henderson, who was an accomplished seamstress. Her maternal grandmother, Katie Douglas Young, was one of eleven children born to Dinah Douglas and Will Douglas in Madison Parish, Louisiana. Andrews-Keenan's mother was also raised in Madison Parish, and moved to New Orleans to find work as a young adult. In New Orleans, she met and married Andrews-Keenan's father, who came from Marion, Louisiana. After five years of marriage, Andrews-Keenan's parents divorced. Andrews-Keenan was a toddler at the time, and was sent to live with her maternal great aunt and uncle, Emma Douglas Rucker and James Rucker, in Tallulah, Louisiana. The town was strictly segregated, and had a thriving African American community. The residents included Zelma Wyche, who was one of the first black police chiefs in the country.

Patricia Andrews-Keenan was raised by her maternal great aunt and uncle, Emma Douglas Rucker and James Rucker, in Tallulah, Louisiana. Their only biological child was an adult at the time, so Andrews-Keenan grew up as an only child. She began her education at the all-black Wright Elementary School. There, she excelled in reading and writing with the support of her fourth grade teacher, Mrs. Bowie. Andrews-Keenan was also taught by Myrtle Washington Wyche, who was married to Tallulah's first African American police chief, Zelma Wyche. When Andrews-Keenan reached the seventh grade, the local schools were integrated, and she was bused to the formerly all-white Tallulah High School. There, Andrews-Keenan and her African American classmates were antagonized by their white peers during the early years of integration. Andrews-Keenan joined the pep squad, and served on the yearbook and newspaper staffs. Upon graduating in 1973, she enrolled at Grambling State University in Grambling, Louisiana.

Patricia Andrews-Keenan graduated from Tallulah High School in Tallulah, Louisiana in 1973. Her son, Richard Andrews, was born shortly afterwards. Wanting to stay close to home, Andrews-Keenan enrolled at Grambling State University in Grambling, Louisiana. She joined the Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority and the Student Government Association, and became the editor of The Gramblinite student newspaper. She also completed an internship at The News-Press in Fort Myers, Florida. Upon graduating in 1977, Andrews-Keenan moved with her mother, Pearline Henderson Chapman, to Denver, Colorado, where she joined the staff of the Denver Weekly News. After a few years, Andrews-Keenan transitioned to a customer service role at Mountain Bell, and then joined the Internal Revenue Service. Dissatisfied with the work, she began searching for a new career path. In 1987, Andrews-Keenan was introduced to cable industry pioneer Gayle Greer, who helped her obtain a fellowship from the Walter Kaitz Foundation.

Patricia Andrews-Keenan received her initial training in the cable television industry through a one-year fellowship from the Walter Kaitz Foundation. After completing the program in 1988, Andrews-Keenan was hired by Syntel, Inc., a phone and cable company in Oak Brook, Illinois. Eight months later, the company was acquired by Jones Intercable. Andrews-Keenan was kept on the payroll as a marketing manager, and was later promoted to director of public affairs. During this time, the City of Naperville sued Jones Intercable for noncompliance with national cable regulations. The company was then acquired by Tele-Communications, Inc. (TCI), and its viewership expanded to include the City of Chicago, Illinois and the surrounding suburbs. Then, TCI was bought by AT&T Broadband LLC, which was in turn bought by the Comcast Corporation in 2000. Andrews-Keenan remained with the company during these acquisitions, and eventually became the vice president of communications at the Comcast Corporation.

Patricia Andrews-Keenan joined the National Association of Minorities in Cable in 1988. She served as a chapter secretary, and was elected president of the organization in 2000. During her presidency, Andrews-Keenan was instrumental in the creation of the association's mentoring program, as well as the executive leadership program at the Anderson School of Management in Los Angeles, California. She also served on the national board of the Women in Cable Telecommunications. Andrews-Keenan continued working for the Comcast Corporation, and was promoted to vice president of communications for the Chicagoland area in 2002. Five years later, she accepted the position of vice president of corporate affairs at Nielsen Media Research. After one year, Andrews-Keenan left to found a public relations firm called the Tallulah Group. That year, she also began teaching a course at Columbia College Chicago. At this point, Andrews-Keenan reflects upon her career, and talks about the future of the cable industry.

Patricia Andrews-Keenan worked in the cable industry for over twenty years. During that time, she served a public relations executive at AT&T Inc., Comcast Corporation and their subsidiaries. At this point in the interview, Andrews-Keenan describes her experiences of racial and gender discrimination in the workplace. In 2008, she left the Comcast Corporation to start her own company, the Tallulah Group. Andrews-Keenan talks about her plans for the future, and describes her son, Richard Andrews, whom she raised as a single parent. She also reflects upon her life and legacy, and her hopes and concerns for the African American community. Andrews-Keenan concludes the interview by describing how she would like to be remembered.
