Series I: Original Interview Footage

Video Oral History Interview with Donna Byrd, Section
Donna Byrd was born on April 26, 1970 in Fort Lee, Virginia to Diane Diggs Boyd and Melvin Boyd. Her paternal family was never enslaved, and descended from an interracial union in 18th century Virginia. Her father grew up in Suffolk, Virginia, and moved to Atlantic City, New Jersey in hopes of earning money to attend Morgan State College. While working, he befriended students from Howard University, and decided to study there instead. Byrd’s maternal grandmother, Dorothy Diggs, belonged to the Native American Meherrin tribe. After the death of Byrd’s paternal grandfather, Victor Diggs, she married Samuel Wilson, Jr., with whom she raised Byrd’s mother in Norfolk, Virginia. Byrd’s mother attended Morgan State College and was among the first women accepted to the Johns Hopkins Medical School, although her stepfather discouraged her from attending. Instead, she decided to serve in the American Red Cross during the Vietnam War. There, she met Byrd’s father, who was the highest ranking black officer in his unit.

Donna Byrd’s father, Melvin Boyd, joined the Reserve Officers Training Corps at Howard University, and entered the U.S. Army upon graduating in 1953. While serving in the Vietnam War, he met Byrd’s mother, Diane Diggs Boyd, who was an American Red Cross worker. They married and moved to Fort Lee, Virginia, and then to Quantico, Virginia and Alexandria, Virginia, where they raised Byrd and her three siblings. They attended Protestant services on the military base in Alexandria, and visited museums in Washington, D.C. after church. Although her family was one of two African American households in the community, Byrd was treated with kindness by her white neighbors, and did not experience discrimination until the age of six years old, when she was excluded from a classmate’s birthday party. When Byrd was ten years old, her family moved to Fort Bragg, North Carolina, and then to Warrenton, Virginia and Heidelberg, Germany, where she graduated from high school.
Donna Byrd enrolled at James K. Polk Elementary School in 1976, four years after the start of busing in Alexandria, Virginia. She enjoyed gymnastics, and worked as a babysitter from an early age. Byrd attended Patrick Henry Middle School for one year before moving to Fort Bragg, North Carolina for her father’s military career. Next, Byrd’s family moved to Warrenton, Virginia, where she attended Warrenton Junior High School and Fauquier High School. With the encouragement of her English teacher, Byrd began participating in oratorical contests, which helped her overcome her stutter. Byrd’s family then moved to Heidelberg, Germany, where she attended Heidelberg American High School on the base. She was elected class treasurer during her first year there. Byrd traveled throughout Europe as a teenager, and once accompanied her father to East Berlin. Upon graduating in 1988, she decided to enroll at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

Donna Byrd decided to attend the University of Virginia rather than the College of William and Mary based on her interactions with students from each school. However, when she arrived on campus in Charlottesville, she found that some of her white peers harbored racist views, and that the university’s Honor System resulted in the disproportionate expulsion of black students. In response, Byrd campaigned successfully for a seat on the honor board during her first year. She later served as the board’s chairperson, and initiated a study that revealed racial bias in the reporting of honor code infringements. Byrd also founded Nights of the Roundtable, a series of discussions about ethics and race. After graduating in 1992, she returned to Alexandria, Virginia as a sales representative for the Procter and Gamble Company. Byrd enrolled at Duke University’s Fuqua School of Business in 1994. She studied abroad at the University of Cape Town in South Africa in 1995, one year after President Nelson Mandela’s election.
Donna Byrd studied briefly at the University of Cape Town in South Africa before graduating from Duke University’s Fuqua School of Business in 1996. She joined The Coca-Cola Company in Atlanta, Georgia, where she worked as a brand manager for Coca-Cola Classic. Byrd then transferred to the new brands team, where she focused on marketing Coca-Cola Citra and helped develop a new water brand called Dasani. After a successful year, Byrd expected a promotion, but was instead transferred back to the Coca-Cola Classic team, where she met radio host Tom Joyner. In 1999, Byrd decided to leave The Coca-Cola Company in order to work at EzGov, Inc., a startup company that made government services available online. She worked as a sales representative, and sold the service to state and local governments throughout the country. In 2001, Byrd’s former colleague, Tom Joyner, created Black America Web, an online news source for African Americans. After a few attempts, he eventually convinced Byrd to join the company.
