Sidmel Estes was born on November 27, 1954 in Marysville, California to Emellen Mitchell Estes and Sidney Estes. Her maternal grandparents, Luella Mitchell and Edward Mitchell, lived in Birmingham, Alabama, where Estes’ mother was born in 1921. Estes’ maternal grandmother died in 1925, and her family then moved to Atlanta, Georgia. There, Estes’ grandfather earned a Ph.D. degree in theology from Emory University, and became a dean at Morris Brown College. Estes’ mother graduated from Atlanta’s Booker T. Washington High School, and then attended Morris Brown College and Atlanta University. After earning a master’s degree in education, she became an elementary school principal. Estes’ paternal grandmother, Fannie Estes, was born in Gaffney, South Carolina. She moved to Atlanta for her husband’s work as a Pullman porter, and gave birth to their only son, Estes’ father, in 1932. He went on to study education, completing a master’s degree at Atlanta University and a Ph.D. degree at Indiana University.
Sidmel Estes grew up in the Collier Heights community in Atlanta, Georgia during the 1960s. She began her education at Frank L. Stanton Elementary School, and then transferred to the newly built M. Agnes Jones Elementary School, where her mother was the principal. Estes took ballet classes with Yolanda King, who was the daughter of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. She became interested in journalism at an early age, after noticing the misrepresentation of civil rights activists by the white press. Upon entering the eighth grade, Estes enrolled at the formerly all-white Northside High School. She became president of the school band, served on the student government and created exhibits for Black History Week. She also joined the staff of The Northerner newspaper, where she covered the Black Panther Party’s breakfast programs. After graduating in 1972, Estes enrolled at Northwestern University, where she studied under scholars like Jan Carew, Cyrus Colter and Robert A. Hill.

Sidmel Estes enrolled in 1972 at Northwestern University’s Medill School of Journalism in Evanston, Illinois. She studied under the noted African American journalist Jay Harris, who mentored Estes and her black peers. Estes completed an internship at the Chicago Defender, where she met John H. Sengstacke, Ethel Payne and Lynn Norment. She also broke the story about Al Green being scalded with hot grits by his girlfriend, which became her first front page article. Estes interned at the Chicago Daily News in 1975, and then decided to focus on the television news industry. Upon completing a master’s degree at Northwestern University in 1977, Estes was hired as a reporter at KUAM-TV in Guam, where she covered the widespread heroin use among U.S. military personnel. Facing harassment from both the military and drug cartels, she returned to Atlanta, Georgia in 1979. That year, she covered the Atlanta Missing and Murdered Children cases for WAGA-TV.
Sidmel Estes joined WAGA-TV in Atlanta, Georgia as an assignment editor in 1979. She was responsible for researching the Atlanta Missing and Murdered Children cases, and met James Baldwin and Lee P. Harris while covering the investigation. During this time, Estes also covered the election of Mayor Andrew Young and the expansion of the William B. Hartsfield Atlanta International Airport. In 1982, Estes became WAGA-TV’s news producer. In 1983, she married B. Garnett Sumpter, whom she later divorced. Estes served as the chairperson of the Atlanta Association of Black Journalists from 1984 to 1986, when she was selected to join a committee of the National Association of Black Journalists (NABJ). Two years later, she was elected as a regional director of NABJ. In 1988, Mayor Andrew Young honored Estes with Sidmel Estes-Sumpter Day. That year, she covered the Democratic National Convention in Atlanta, and the opening of the MARTA transit system. In 1991, Estes became the first female president of NABJ.

Sidmel Estes used her position as president of the National Association of Black Journalists to advocate for equal hiring and better coverage of black communities. She hosted a summit to address these issues with the leaders of the four national associations of journalists of color and the CEOs of major news organizations including Knight Ridder, the Gannett Company, Inc. and The New York Times. In 1992, She Estes created the morning news program ‘Good Day Atlanta’ for WAGA-TV in Atlanta, Georgia in 1992. The program grew rapidly grew in popularity to become the city’s most -watched morning news show in Atlanta. Initially hosted by Amanda Davis and Paul Ossman, the program featured guests including musicians Patti LaBelle, George Clinton and Usher, boxer Evander Holyfield and author Cornel West. Five years later the WAGA-TV station was acquired by FOX. Estes continued to produce ‘Good Day Atlanta’ until 2006, when she decided to leave WAGA-TV because of the interference of FOX executives. That year, she founded a Sidmel Estes was the president of the National Association of Black Journalists (NABJ). In 1994, she held the first UNITY: Journalists of Color convention in Atlanta, Georgia, which brought NABJ together with the national associations for Hispanic, Asian American and Native American journalists. At this point in the interview, Estes talks about changes to the organization, which was renamed UNITY: Journalists of Diversity, and shares her thoughts on the inclusion of gay and lesbian journalists. She describes her hopes and concerns for the African American community, and reflects upon her life and legacy. She also talks about her sons, Joshua Sumpter and Sidney Sumpter, and concludes this part of the interview by describing how she would like to be remembered.

Sidmel Estes narrates her photographs.
